A JUST POISE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY HOWARD MARKLE HOKE.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

"I SUPPOSE you know," said Daniel Hazlitt, the junior partner of Bromwood & Company, when Alfred Crown, head of the silk department, came to the private office in response to his summons, "that we have a strong rival in the new dry goods firm across the street." "I have good cause to know it," Crown replied, "for they are pushing my department hard just now on a line of silks. But it is only a question of time until the people find out the poor value of the stuff they are buying over there. Their methods can't succeed in the long run."

"They are succeeding annoyingly well just now," said Hazlitt. "Our old time methods are having a rather severe trial."

Crown barely hid his surprise, and glanced into the adjoining office to see if Mr. Bromwood, the senior partner, was within hearing. He was not, and Hazlitt seemed safe in expressing what the young man considered treasonable opinions.

"I think our record for fair dealing, Mr. Hazlitt, will stand more than the rivalry of the new firm," he said.

"It may prove a costly experiment, though, to stick to the old methods. I have sent for you to suggest that you devise some plan to head off our competitor in this silk matter. I happen to know that one of the new firm's employes can be approached and that an adroit man can induce him to give the name of the manufacturer of this popular line of silks and the prices the firm pays. It seems they bought the entire output for last year. Now, Mr. Crown, I would like you to arrange matters so that we can underbid the firm over there for the next year's production of this line of silk."

Crown did not try to hide his surprise, but the junior partner was unmoved by it. The young man got up from his chair and took one of Bromwood & Company's letter heads from Hazlitt's desk. At the top was a device representing a hand holding a pair of scales, exactly balancing a quantity of goods and a stack of coin. Over it was printed "A Just Poise." This had been the motto of the house ever since Mr. Bromwood's father had modestly started the business many years before.

"Mr. Hazlitt," said Crown, "don't you think this firm will have to adopt a new device when it resorts to such methods for getting trade?"

"Do you presume to dictate what the policy of the house is to be?" demanded Hazlitt.

"I have no such intention, sir, but I do wish to say that I cannot treat with this employe in the manner you suggest, and I could not conscientiously ask my clerks to recommend that silk to our customers."

"I must tell you, Mr. Crown, that there is to be a change here. We must adopt more aggressive methods, and we must have employes in sympathy with them."

"A departure from the days of the just poise, sir?"

"As an employe that is not a question for you. The point you are to decide is whether you will do as I suggest."

"I have decided that point. I cannot do so."

"I see that my proposal has taken you by surprise, and I believe you will see it in a different light by morning. Come in then with your answer."

"I will think it over, but my answer will be the same."

He gave a last look into Mr. Bromwood's office as he went out, but the senior partner had not come in. Crown had not dared to ask Hazlitt if Mr. Bromwood was a party to the new policy, for it had been understood that the junior partner was managing the business.

This matter had come to Crown at a very critical time. His marriage had been announced for the next month. If he should not do as Hazlitt proposed he was almost certain to be replaced by a man who would. Ought he to risk Alice's happiness on account of what some of his business friends would term an old time conscience? It needed but a few moments of consideration to see that Alice herself was the one to decide a question bearing upon her own future; so he told her all about it in the evening.

"I am not surprised, Alfred," she said. "I heard only a few days ago that Bromwood & Company are to be more aggressive, and that Mr. Hazlitt intends to get rid of some of the old employes. It is a part of his plan, I understand, to put Mr. Zandon in your place."

"Parker Zandon!"

"Yes."

"Then good bye to the days of the just poise."

"It looks so, Alfred. Mr. Zandon's interests are being urged upon the firm by some active business men of the city; but I want you to tell Mr. Hazlitt tomorrow morning that you will not do as he asks."

"But suppose I am dismissed, and our marriage announced for next month?"

"We are both strong enough to bear disappointment, if it must come, Alfred."

On his way home Crown met Zandon, who walked some distance with him.

"I'm glad to talk to you, Crown," he said, "for I must tell you that a new era is just ahead of Bromwood & Company. Hazlitt is disgusted with the old fogey methods and is going to push us to the front. I knew five years ago, when he became junior partner, that he would make an active, up-to-date business house of the ancient affair. He had to wait awhile, you know, but he is now ready to cut loose from the back number methods."

"Do you think we ought to risk the reputation that has been won on the principle of the just poise?"

"Oh, that pair of scales will have to go up to the loft with all the other grandfather remnants and ideas. If I were Hazlitt I'd have a new letterhead mighty quick."

"One of a pair of scales with the money end down, Zandon."

"Well, it's money that kicks the beam anyhow, Crown. We're all after money down there—old Bromwood as much as anyone—and I don't mind telling you, in strict confidence, that I am to be a factor in the new policy. I've had the best business influence of the city working in my favor for months. Good night."

Crown stood some minutes considering the advisability of going out to consult Mr. Bromwood, but decided to wait until Hazlitt's plan should be fully disclosed, knowing that, in the event of a dismissal, he would have the right of appeal to the senior partner.

When he reached the store next morning some workmen were rigging a pulley and ropes to a beam that projected from the roof. The head of the ribbon department was watching them and Crown asked him what was to be done.

"They are going to take down that old device."

He referred to a large wooden representation of the hand holding balanced scales. Without waiting to hear any more Crown went to his place and took up his duties. He felt that his connection with the old and honored house was nearly at an end, for Hazlitt would not likely go so far as to take down the ancient sign without Mr. Bromwood's approval. The summons from the junior partner soon came and he responded promptly.

"Good morning, Mr. Crown," Hazlitt pleasantly greeted him. "Please take a chair and wait a few moments. I have sent for Mr. Zandon also."

While he waited Mr. Bromwood came into his own room and sat down at his desk. Hazlitt was not disturbed, nor did he show any disposition to postpone the interview. For the hundredth time Crown went over the reasons that induced him to decline his proposal. He could not see any way to justify an acceptance or to convince himself that the long respected house had not come upon evil days.

While he sat thinking Henry Robertson came into Mr. Bromwood's office. He was a wealthy banker and had been a boyhood and business friend of Crown's father. He had continued this friendship with the young man in a distant way, but had shown no interest in his progress beyond an occasional inquiry. He was reputed to be heartily in favor of modern methods and of pushing business to the utmost limit.

Crown saw that a matter of some importance was to be transacted, and, as Zandon had been sent for, it was likely that Robertson was the man whose influence he had secured. He had never thought of asking outside help to advance his position, and he might have had Mr. Robertson's for the asking. It occurred to him that perhaps he had put too much dependence upon faithfulness to his duties and loyalty to the principles of the house.

Zandon soon made his appearance with an air of confidence that depressed Crown. Hazlitt greeted him pleasantly; then, stepping to the communicating door, requested Mr. Bromwood to come into his office. Bidding Mr. Robertson sit still, the senior partner walked out, spoke to Zandon and Crown in his customary business manner, and sat down.

"Mr. Bromwood," Hazlitt began, "I have asked these two young men to come here to give their views regarding the move I explained to you yesterday. I am glad you can hear them."

"I shall listen with interest," Mr. Bromwood replied, briskly.

"Now, Mr. Zandon," said the junior partner, "have you decided upon any way to bring about the result I detailed to you yesterday?"

"Yes, sir, I think I have a plan that will completely outwit our rivals across the street. I have already invited the employe you spoke of to lunch with me today, and I know a way to get a hold on him so that he can't refuse to give me the name of that silk manufacturer and the price his firm paid for the output of last year. As soon as I have this information I'll be ready to start in an hour for the manufactory with your bid for the output of the next year. In addition, I have thought of this, and I suggest it for your consideration. Why couldn't we agree to pay this man a certain sum every year to stay over there and give us the inside of the firm's methods and plans? We could often forestall them on many lines of goods."

"What is your opinion of that plan, Mr. Bromwood?" asked Hazlitt, turning to the senior partner.

"A very well laid business manoeuver," was the reply, "if it will succeed."

"Oh, it will succeed," cried Zandon, proudly, "I'll make it succeed."

"You think, do you, that this line of silk would be an advantage to have on our counters?" Mr. Bromwood asked.

"Oh, well," said Zandon, with a shrug of his shoulders and a sly laugh, "the silk is not what it looks to be, but it catches the customers every time. It's a first class seller and money maker, and that's what we're all in business for, I take it."

"Mr. Crown," said Hazlitt, "you see I've given Mr. Zandon an equal chance with yourself. What plan have you to suggest?"

He leaned expectantly across his desk and Mr. Broomwood, re-adjusting his glasses, looked on with the critical attention of a shrewd business man. Crown rose from his chair, and walking slowly over to the junior partner's desk, said:

"I told you yesterday, Mr. Hazlitt, that I could not perform such a service for this house, and I have not changed my mind."

"Do you mean us to understand, Mr. Crown, that you do not feel competent to deal with our rivals?" Mr. Bromwood asked.

"No, sir, I do not wish you to understand that. What I mean is that I am not able—I should say, willing—to deal with them in the way Mr. Zandon proposes. If I have any suggestion to make, it is to keep the stuff they sell for silk as far from our counters as possible, and continue to give our customers that value for their money that has sustained the motto of the just poise."

"Then you have nothing better to propose than the old time way of doing business?" asked Hazlitt.

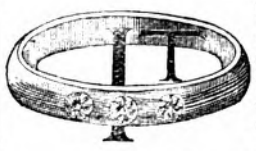
"You forget, don't you, Mr. Crown, that we are living in aggressive times?" Mr. Bromwood supplemented.

"No, sir, I do not. We can be aggressive without being dishonest, sir. Catchy methods may win for awhile, but I know that when the people of this city want to buy something good, sir, they come to Bromwood & Company. The best way we can fight that firm over there is to keep that old wooden device in plain sight over our door; but now that it is being torn down I have no hope that my plan will commend itself to you."

"Very well, then," said Mr. Bromwood, rising abruptly, as was his habit when a question was finally settled, "you will act according to our agreement, Mr. Hazlitt."

He went into his office. Hazlitt turned to Zandon and said:

"Mr. Zandon, I will send for you later in the day. I have something to say to Mr. Crown."



The young fellow went out triumphantly. Hazlitt rose from his desk, took up a folded paper, and came around to Crown.

"Give me the pleasure of shaking hands with you as our next junior partner, Mr. Crown," he said, with a smile. "Mr. Robertson is here ready to arrange the money side of the transaction for you. By the way, that old wooden design is being taken down, but only to be repainted and put back fresher and more securely than ever. Our business is to be carried on along the very lines you have so well mapped out this morning. But come into the other office; Mr. Bromwood and Mr. Robertson are waiting for us."

IS one continued hustle nowadays to get even within sight of the hill of fame, when so many clever fellows are on the alert for something by which to distinguish themselves and entitle them to a place even at the foot of the ladder among the crowd aspiring for the title of journalist.

And it does seem hard luck when a college bred man with the ordinary amount of ambition lacks the essential push and so drops out of the rush with the sigh "game not worth the candle" and sinks into the oblivion of an ordinary newspaper-reporter's life. But surely enough one thing, however unimportant in itself, leads to another, and this unsolved mystery concerning the disappearance of Lady Pierpont's three rubies offered me the long looked for opportunity of making a name for myself, perchance at the same time a "scoop" for my paper.

The events connected with the mysterious disappearance were these: While traveling in a private car from New York to San Francisco, between eight and nine o'clock on the evening after leaving the Metropolis, three perfect rubies of infinite value set in a heavy gold bracelet had been lost. The fact that none but the porter, maid, a Boston terrier (which Lady Pierpont had in charge for a friend) and the lady herself had entered the car was alone enough to rest suspicion on the two servants. The bracelet was found near the door of the car, where Lady Pierpont remembered having removed her jacket, but the stones had been dexterously taken from their settings.

The train was stopped, the car side-tracked and there they remained for twenty-four hours, until detectives of note had arrived and the maid and porter were placed under arrest.

Among other reporters I was sent out by the New York T——, but the affair seemed so unique,—not for a moment had either suspect left the car and yet not a trace of the jewels was to be found,—that I obtained permission of Lady Pierpont to remain on the spot and assist if possible in locating the missing stones. She was extremely irritable and to add to her unpleasant frame of mind, the dog had early that morning wandered off from the car and had not returned. This however, did not annoy her as it might, were she fond of dogs or had she not agreed to transport this one at the "owner's risk." The weather was extremely hot and whether it was our location or what we could not tell, but a most pungent odor arose toward night which stayed by us the rest of the trip, and the fact that the porter was the only one who did not apparently notice this made me regard him as too big a fool to be able to conceal jewels had he had wits enough to steal them; so I dismissed him from my suspicions and turned my attention to the maid.

And it was with no regret on my part when the officials declared Jim the guilty party and at once took him to the nearest jail. I congratulated myself on being left an open field—for it had been proven Jim hadn't the jewels on his person—where then were they but on the car?

We attached ourselves to the next train and were en route for San Francisco. But each day as the search became more fruitless the odor became more offensive. And each night about the same time I was awakened by sounds coming from the upper end of the car. I spoke of this to Lady Pierpont, but she was a heavy sleeper and saw no possible connection between this and her missing stones, so directly dismissed it from her mind.

However, I was determined to find out what this meant, and that night I crept from my apartment and concealed myself none too soon behind a portiere at the end of the car. Directly I heard the same sounds and some one chopping ice. Now what could the maid—for she was the only other person beside myself and her mistress in the car—what could she possibly want of ice at that precise time every night? and then the picking ceased and I heard a board crack almost behind me. In less time than it takes to tell, the whole apartment was filled with a most nauseating odor. And as I curiously passed out of my concealment I ran against the maid who, as surprised as I, rushed past me in an endeavor to escape me, but returned almost immediately, pushing a small bit of paper into my hand and breathlessly explaining that the porter, Jim, had given it to her on the eve of his arrest. It was too dark to read and as I slipped it into my pocket till I could get my bearings and strike a light the most unexpected of all things happened—the train lurched and jumped the track and I found myself deposited, with scarce a scratch save a bruised head and a twisted ankle, in a ditch.

To tell how I passed the next few hours would only be to dwell on the suffering of the more unfortunate than I, and not coming any nearer the solution of the mystery. Both Lady Pierpont and maid, among many others, were killed outright. And as I watched the wrecking hands here and there I pulled from my pocket a crumpled scrap of paper. Then the whole scene came back to me. The missing rubies and that sickening odor—and I read:

"I fed the dog the stones wrapped in pieces of meat. Dog died. Keep ice on body in corner of car so it won't smell strong. I'll get word to you later and divide."

A short time later with the assistance of the pungent odor, I discovered the dog's remains and after performing an intensely disagreeable operation extracted the jewels, of which I am the undisputed possessor today. And though they are valued up in the thousands each, not for worlds would I turn them into their cash value, for from that time all my ventures have been successful, due, I confidently believe to the talismanic power of the three rubies.

The Evil Eye of Lieutenant Melendy.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY GEORGE H. SMITH.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

AMONG the things which the dispatches from Manila did not report were the peculiar circumstances connected with the case of Lieutenant James Melendy.

This officer was in charge of a scouting party sent out from the town of Unatonga. The party was ambushed by a force of Tagalog natives, and several of the Americans were killed. Lieutenant Melendy and one private were taken prisoners. The remainder of the scouting party escaped, eventually getting back to Unatonga.

When the return of the last of the stragglers to camp made it certain that the lieutenant and one of his men were in the hands of the natives, the officer in command at Unatonga began energetic efforts to secure their release. A squad of men was sent out from the American outposts towards the Tagalog stronghold. At a suitable distance they were halted, and one man advanced alone, displaying a white handkerchief tied to the bayonet of the gun he carried. This man stopped a hundred yards in advance of his companions, and displayed his signal. After a considerable delay he was joined by a messenger from within the native lines. The result of these negotiations was the bringing of two letters to the American commander. One of these letters was from the natives, setting forth, in the Spanish language, that they would exchange Lieutenant Melendy for a young Tagalog leader named Arolan, who had been captured by the Americans some time before and kept in confinement at Unatonga. With this letter was a note from Lieutenant Melendy himself, begging that his rescue be hastened.

"Private Collins, who was captured with me, has already died of fever," he wrote, "and unless I can be exchanged I almost hope that I may go as he did. I am kept under a shed, tied by the legs to two posts, and never left without a guard. At night the Tagalogs, men and women both, gather around me and flourishing their barongs, tell what they are going to do with me if Arolan is not returned.

"Do not try to rescue me by force. My guards have orders to kill me rather than have me recaptured."

Two days after these letters were receiv[illegible] Unatonga answers to them we[illegible] the same way that the first communications had been sent. The reply to the Tagalog chief stated in Spanish that the representative of the American Government at Unatonga required more time to consider the matter of an exchange of prisoners.

The letter to Lieutenant Melendy was in English, which none of the Tagalogs could read. "Arolan has suddenly and most mysteriously disappeared," it said. "Until your letter was received we supposed he had escaped and returned home. Since we heard from you that he is not there we have had the town searched for him repeatedly, but to no purpose. Try and stave off the Tagalogs with some excuse, while we keep up the hunt; and don't lose courage."

That evening the natives gathered around the prisoner's shed, as usual, as the visitors to a park would have flocked to the cage of some strange new beast. Melendy wondered gloomily how long he could "stave them off," when he happened to see a man in the crowd holding a slim Malay game cock under each arm. There came to his mind an account which he had read in a current book of Philippine travels,* of how the writer had mystified a group of Filipinos by hypnotizing a native fowl. Every farmer's boy knows the trick.

"Give me that bird!" he said in Spanish. "I want to make anting, anting."

Anting anting is a Philippine term which is applied to the most powerful charms of which the natives can conceive.

The owner of the birds demurred, at first, but finally handed over one of them. The crowd pressed closer, curious, but half frightened. The officer took the wild-eyed, scared fowl, and tucking the bird's head beneath one wing swung him in a circle five times through the air. When he laid him down upon the ground the fowl might have been dead, for any sign of life he showed.

The natives looked on silently, but when Melendy reached for the other bird they shrank back to give him room. Slowly he swung this fowl like the other, the motions of his hand throwing great shadowy circles in the firelight. He stooped to put the dazed bird down, when——

"Arolan! Arolan!" A woman's voice cried out the name, as if in deadly fear, adding, a moment later, "Help him! Help him! Help him!"

It was the daughter of the Tagalog chief, sunk down on her knees among the other women, close by the posts to which the officer was hobbled. The woman's wide open eyes were full of fear, but it was not a fear of anything she saw close at hand. Her eyes were looking beyond the shed, and the fire, and the frightened natives, out through the darkness to something which they saw far away.

Lieutenant Melendy had been a medical student before the company of the National Guard to which he belonged had been called out, and he knew enough of hypnotism to recognize its subject.

"Where is Arolan?" he demanded of the woman, losing not a moment of time while her trance should last.

"He is in an old house. Canes wave around it. He is wounded and dying. I see him lying on the floor, and hear him groan for water. O help——" The voice grew fainter, and stopped. The speaker struggled to her feet and gazed about her curiously, wondering why her companions looked at her so strangely. All shrank back from the shed, and hurried away in the darkness to their thatched huts to talk in whispers of the white man's evil eye.

But the prisoner, before he slept that night, wrote by the light of the watch fire a letter to the American commander, giving a full and careful account of what had happened.

"Perhaps this will not amount to anything," he wrote. "What happened may have been merely the hysterics of a half-wild girl. It is possible, though, that this was one of those rare instances which come to hint to us the existence of powers or forces which are not yet understood. It may mean much to me, or nothing."

The next morning it was not easy to find a messenger to carry this letter to Unatonga. The natives were divided between fear of what would happen to them if they took it, and fear of what the wonder-working writer of the epistle might do to them if they refused to take it. Finally a Tagalog warrior who was the possessor of an unusually powerful anting anting consented to go.

Before the courier started the lieutenant added a postscript. "I find my performance of last night," he wrote, "has gained for me the reputation of having an evil eye. It is said I have bewitched the chief's daughter, who, it seems, was to marry Arolan. Her father, the Tagalog chief, is not here now, but unless Arolan shows up before the chief returns it is easy to see my finish. I could wish it had been different, but it is all for the same thing in the end."

There followed some messages to be sent back to his home in the States; one to his father, and one to a young woman who was reading eagerly each day's Philippine dispatches in the daily papers. It was hard for the lieutenant to write the last few sentences, but not half so hard as it was for his commander to read them.

Three days later the Tagalogs were gathered about the prison shed to see the American officer die. The native chief had come home. To him, trying the keenness of his barong's edge, a sentinel came running with word that

HAVE WOMEN SOULS?

"If women have no souls to save—as some sects teach—is there to be no salvation for their bodies?"

"Even when Nature, who does make horrible blunders, has decreed that motherhood shall be life-long invalidism and misery, if not death-dealing, still most women more or less cheerfully do their duty in the sphere in which man is willing they should live."—THE GENTLEWOMAN.

The writer in The Gentlewoman is only voicing a widely accepted theory in the statement that "Nature has decreed that motherhood shall be life-long invalidism and misery, if not death-dealing." But it is a bold challenge to Nature, to say that "she makes horrible blunders."

"Are God and Nature then at strife, that Nature lends such evil dreams?"

If there be one woman in all the world who has found the result of maternity to be not "life-long invalidism and misery" but life-long happiness and health, then that woman takes up the challenge thrown down to Nature. But more than this. If there were but one woman who had been emancipated from the sufferings of her sex, who had been led out of that darkened chamber to which each month condemned her, who had been rescued from invalidism and misery as a consequence of motherhood, then that one woman stands as type of the possibility of health to every other woman.

AN ARMY OF WOMEN.

There is an army of 500,000 women, representing in their ranks every form and place of female weakness, so-called, from mere irregularity in the young woman to chronic disease of the womb involving complications that have kept the victim practically bed-ridden for ten or even fifteen years, and every one of these has been perfectly and permanently cured. Expressions such as "I am a new woman!" "I never knew what it was to live before!" "I am gone back again to be robust and rosy-cheeked as in youth!" "I have never been able to save a child before; now I have the brightest of healthy babies!" "I scarcely suffered at all with my last child; it was wonderful,"—such expressions teem in the thousands of letters received from grateful women in the past thirty years.

Mrs. Carrie B. Donner, of Dayton, Green Co., Wis., writes: "I can highly recommend Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription—having taken it for nine months previous to confinement. I suffered scarcely any compared with what I had at other times."

Mrs. Annie Blacker, 629 Catherine Street, Syracuse, N. Y., writes: "Your medicines have done wonders for me. For years my health was very poor. I had four miscarriages, but since taking Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and 'Golden Medical Discovery' I have much better health, and now I have a fine healthy baby."

And who has wrought this deliverance for women? What means have brought about these many cures?

The work has been done by Dr. R. V. Pierce, chief consulting physician of the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y. The general means has been the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, supplemented by his special advice where special difficulties had to be overcome.

The endeavor to do what has never been done before with a proprietary medicine, adapt it to individual needs and peculiar cases, was the origin of the offer of free consultation by letter with Dr. Pierce.

The medical profession has only a few leaders. The mass of the doctors are followers. They cannot originate. They follow somebody else in method of treatment and in the use of medicines. For this reason they cannot make allowance for the variations of individual temperaments which are so important a feature in the treatment of diseases of women. They treat all alike. Delicate, nervous, are treated without any consideration of the difference between them and the more coarsely organized of their sex. And in this way women are often treated for the wrong disease. When the womb is affected various nervous [illegible] possible, even insanity. Unless practitioners treat the patient for the disorder, not appreciating the real cause.

J. S. Carlisle, Esq., of Manchester, Coffee Co., Tenn., writes: "I have been using your medicines for the last sixteen or eighteen years in my Poor House. I am superintendent of the Coffee County Poor House and Asylum combined. Your 'Favorite Prescription,' 'Golden Medical Discovery,' and 'Pleasant Pellets,' are the best medicines for the diseases for which they are recommended that I ever used. They saved my wife's life at the time of 'change of life'. I also cured the worst case of lunacy that we ever had with your 'Favorite Prescription.' The case had been under the doctor's care for three years. I used your medicine about seven or eight months and the patient was as well as she ever was in her life. This was nine years ago, and she is still in good health."

Dr. Pierce is a leader, not a follower. He has devoted more than thirty years to the treatment and cure of diseases of women. He is head of one of the most important medical institutions in the land. People come from all over the country to be treated at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, at Buffalo, N. Y. To meet these demands, Dr. Pierce has gathered about him a medical staff of nearly a score of physicians. These men are all specialists in some branch of medicine or surgery.

A GREAT OFFER FREE.

You are offered a free consultation by letter with Dr. Pierce, and this means that you are offered free the best medical skill in the country. You could get high class medical service and advice in many another institution. But high class is high price, and few people can spare the money to consult the skilled specialists of great institutions.

If these facts are as stated, if the claims above made are true, there is no reason for another year of suffering for you. Are you a sufferer every month? You can be cured. Do you suffer daily with aching back, bearing-down pains, the miseries of mind and body which follow diseases of the womb and other organs of generation? You can be cured. There are only two chances in a hundred that your cure will not be perfect and life-lasting. There are ninety-eight chances in a hundred that you will enter on a new period of existence.

All this can come to you at very little cost, without any of the unpleasant questionings, the offensive examinations and obnoxious local treatments deemed necessary by many local practitioners. You can begin with "Favorite Prescription," today; or you can write a letter to Dr. Pierce and make a plain statement of your case. In either case you take the first step to health when you begin Dr. Pierce's treatment. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

Accept no substitute for Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. A substitute medicine means a big profit for the dealer, and nothing at all for you, because the promises made for Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription do not and cannot apply to an imitation or substitute. There is no alcohol contained in Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, neither opium, cocaine nor other narcotic.

A GREAT GIFT.

Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser is sent free on receipt of stamps to defray expense of mailing only. This great work contains 1008 pages and over 700 illustrations. It is a guide to health and happiness, and should be included in the library of every household. Send 21 one-cent stamps (to pay expense of mailing only) for the paper-bound book or 31 stamps for the book bound in durable cloth. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

a party of white soldiers were come in sight. "They are waving a white flag," the man said, adding, "they are hurrying up the hill, far this side the usual meeting place."

"Send men to meet them," the chief said, and waited.

Arolan was found. "The Tagalog girl saw him, all right enough," the message to Melendy said. "We found him in an abandoned native hut, in the cane brake outside the town. He had almost gone free, one night, but a picket saw some one creeping towards the brake, and fired, having no thought it was any one but a scout, and not knowing in the darkness, afterwards, if his shot had hit its mark. Arolan, wounded, was able to drag himself into this hut and lie there. Although a young man, and strong, it is a miracle he was not dead before we found him. I see no reason now why he should not recover, though, and write his chief with this that if you are still alive he shall be sent home as soon as able. God grant this may not be too late."

A week later two parties met half way between the American and Filipino lines, and the convalescent Arolan, borne upon a litter, was exchanged for Lieutenant Melendy. Before the Tagalog party passed out of sight, the lieutenant, looking back, saw a young woman run down the hill to meet it. When she reached the litter she knelt beside it and clasped the wounded man upon it in her arms.

The Eagles on the Shoulder Straps.

CAN a woman love two men at the same time, honestly truly love two, and feel indifferent as to which should call her wife?

"It is a question that has fairly broken its way within my heart, and within the hour.

"Only a short time since Carrol Ames held my hand, and asked me to be his wife. I loved him, I still love him, and the answer was almost given, when suddenly before me appeared Frank Farral, coming, I knew, to ask me the same question.

"I did not answer the one as I had intended; I could not, so hastily bade him wait until he returned from Cuba with an eagle on his epaulettes, and slipped my ring upon his finger.

"Poor fellow! He mentioned something about how he would win the eagles or lose his life, and hastened away as Frank Farral entered the room. I knew he had taken my answer as a pledge.

"Then came the story of love, the same request from Frank Farral to become his wife, and again a 'Yes' quivered on my lips, when, was it prophetic, a shadow fell between us and it seemed that I saw the outstretched hand of Carrol Ames. Thus I gave the response as to the other one, and placed my bracelet upon his wrist.

"He too took it as an acceptance, and tomorrow they sail to Cuba, both officers in the same regiment, both splendid noble fellows; and which one do I love? Some way my heart tells me that I will marry one of these men, or——"

The beautiful girl, for she was beautiful in face and form, stood by the window where she had parted first with one, then with the other of the two young officers, rivals with many others in the pursuit of her hand and heart, the former carrying a fortune with it.

A brilliant society butterfly, never before had she been forced to analyze her own heart as on that day, and as the twilight gathered about her, she could not but feel that she had acted both the tyrant and the coward, for had she not sent two brave men forth to win her by the price she had set upon her love—the eagle upon their shoulder straps.

She was a coquette; she played with the hearts of honest men for the pleasure it gave her; but now in the gloaming the shadows gathering without seemed creeping into her heart until, with a shudder she walked rapidly to another room where the bright gas-light dispelled the gloom, and from her lips came the bold words:

"If I have done wrong I accept my fate."

Two men, splendid specimens of perfect manhood, white-faced, fearless, determined, awaiting in line of battle for the word that must soon come, to storm the Spanish stronghold beyond the dense foliage in which their regiment lay concealed, crouching before the charge that must end in the death grapple.

One of these two officers was Carrol Ames, the other Frank Farral, both of them that day in command of a battalion. The two were beloved by their brother officers, idolized by their men, and it was generally prophesied that they would fight their way rapidly up the difficult ladder of promotion, or find a grave in Cuba.

They had been the best of friends until a woman's hand came between them, and friendship is but a name where love rules heart and brain. Each man had left home believing he had won the love of a true woman, though she had not then told them in so many words. Each man felt a sympathy then, as Death's dark wing was hovering over them, for the other, and Frank Farral stepped quickly to where his one time friend stood some distance apart from all others, extended his hand and said earnestly:

"Carrol, old fellow, let us be friends now, for frankly I confess had you won the love of Lucille Bruce instead of I, my hand would have been offered in warmest congratulation."

Carrol Ames regarded him with a look of intense surprise mingled with indignation, and the silence that followed was at last broken by the low uttered words:

"Had I won? Great God, man! I did win, you lost!"

"Do you mean to assert that you won the love of Lucille Bruce who is pledged to me?"

"I mean that as far as woman can do so without words, Frank Farral, Lucille Bruce pledged herself to me, told me to come back to her wearing a Colonel's rank on my shoulder straps—and see I wear her ring and——"

"Say no more, Ames, for I believe you, and let me add that to-day will be the one for you to win your eagles—or death.

"We have got to charge a steep rugged hill ahead of us, upon which the Spaniards are intrenched, and orders are simply to take it."

"I am aware of what our orders are and what my duty is, sir."

"Doubtless, but let me suggest that the Spaniards' flag on the staff at the hill top is a trophy well worth having, and the man who pulls it down goes a long way toward winning rapid promotion. I intend to strive for that flag, as a souvenir of Cuba to bear back to our home and lay it at the feet of the fair Lucille—do you dare follow me, Carrol Ames?"

The tone was cold, cynical, the words pointed to inflame a brave man to a desperate act.

"Dare I follow you? I shall lead, follow if you dare."

These words came through shut teeth, and with a smile Frank Farral returned to the head of his men, having uttered no word after the first to prove what he deemed his claim for the love of Lucille Bruce.

He had seen and recognized the ring worn by Carrol Ames as one he had often seen upon Lucille's engagement finger and it was proof that the girl was playing one of them false.

Her bracelet was still upon his right arm, caught back out of sight, but now he allowed it to drop down around his wrist in full view, and a valuable trinket it was.

Suddenly a General and his staff rode along the line and disappeared in the distance. He had only said: "Stand ready men! there is deadly work cut out for you!"

Then came the clear notes of the bugle sounding the advance, and every officer grasped his sword hilt, every man his rifle, while orders ran from lip to lip.

On marched the men, and the rattle of the Mausers was heard ahead, then the lines increased their step to a double quick, and loudly with thrilling and forboding notes the bugle sounded the charge and the deadly assault was begun.

The Spanish stronghold had been won at the sword and bayonet point, and where revolvers and clubbed rifles played their part in the orgie of death.

All the way up the steep hillside, dead and wounded men lay scattered, and on the summit there were ghastly heaps of Spanish dead while American soldiers panting like hounds had thrown themselves down to rest after victory well and dearly won.

Amid the heap of Spanish dead lay an American officer wearing the number of his regiment. Another officer, with his hand clutching the Spanish flag he had hauled down from its staff, stood near, sadly gazing down upon the slain. Stooping, he took from the body of the dead a few valuables and ordered:

"Throw the colors over him men, for never man died more bravely, and he fell with the Spanish flag almost within his grasp."

"But you had already cut the flag down, sir, and those who saw you say you'll get your eagles for this day's work, Captain," and a cheer answered the words of the enthusiastic soldier.

Echoing through the silent streets of the city of the Dead was heard the music of a band as it led the way toward an open grave. The tramp, tramp of soldiers was heard, and in their midst was carried a flag-covered coffin. Behind them came many carriages, for a hero was being buried, his remains sent from Cuba to find resting place in the family burying ground, and many kindred and friends were there to mourn him dead.

The rifles rattled a farewell volley over the grave, a bugle plaintively sounded "taps" and the vast concourse turned away from the mound now hidden beneath flowers.

One carriage turned out of the retreating line, was halted some distance off, and a woman deeply veiled retraced her way to the hero's grave. There she stood with bowed head, and toward her, from the shelter of some foliage came a man in full uniform.

She heard his steps when close at hand, started, and throwing back her veil she extended her hand:

"Why Major Farral——"

"Colonel, Miss Bruce, for I received my Colonelcy of Volunteers three days ago."

"Allow me to congratulate you upon winning your eagles so quickly, but I supposed you were in Cuba."

"A wound gained for me two months' leave; but permit me to say I need no congratulations, Miss Bruce, above the grave of my murdered friend."

"Murdered! I have heard how nobly poor Captain Ames died leading a charge, or rather how he followed you up that terrible hill—it makes me shudder; but why do you say he was murdered?"

"He was, by the two who now stand by his grave, you and I, Lucille Bruce, for you sent him to face death, as you did me, within an implied pledge of love, and I knew it from his lips, and dared him to follow where I led. He did follow, and lost his life while I am spared.

"Here is the ring you gave him, and at your feet I fling the bracelet given me as a silent pledge of love, for you are not worthy the love we two gave you."

He threw the bracelet at her feet, she having mechanically taken the ring, and like one in a dream saw him walk away.

Picking up the bracelet she turned from the grave, almost reeling at first; but entering her carriage, said sternly to the coachman:

"Home!"

The ring and bracelet are seen to-day upon the hand of Lucille Bruce, but her beautiful face wears a saddened look, for she has learned her bitter lesson well and though

OUTWITTED BY PEGGY.

ANOTHER Census! The same rush, push and agony to "get in." I thought the last one ten years ago would kill me, but here it is; ten thousand women begging, weeping and asking for help! I wouldn't mind, but not half of them need the places and only keep deserving ones out."

Tom Seward was literary. He was an elect of old "Newspaper Row," at the capital—was a great power in editorial rooms, correspondent of the "Spouting Horn," "Breezy War," and sent live messages from Congress to the east and west. Wrote fine "Leaders," prophesied nobly on "what's to turn up next!" When particularly solid and good he dashed off spiritual articles for the "church" and "church union." Even odes and sonnets fell gently from his pen.

He was a power in Newspaper Row—and in his bachelor home on a beautiful avenue at the capital, an ideal undisputed head. But for once he was outwitted. Nobody knew just when this home came into existence. One wintry day it sprang into light and life. The first night was dark outside, but through yellow silk curtains leaped the gold and crimson firelight; visions of books and pictures, swift flutterings of a soft gown and curls. The other boys in the row said "lucky Tom! a sister to make his home beautiful." Tom said "Yes, my youngest sister Peggy, the last of the flock, uncalled for."

Tom was ten years older, perhaps wiser than ten years ago, but his opinions on the census were the very same.

On this particular evening with a storm outside, but Paradise within, Tom lay on the pretty home-made divan, Peggy's pride, smoking his cigar, while his sister deftly slipped the scarlet wool over her white fingers as she knitted a spread for the divan—for red was Tom's color.

"Did you know Tom that Mary Wright and Sue Jones had received their appointments?"

"Appointments to what?"

"Why the Census, of course!"

"What in thunder Peg do you know or care about the Census? It's to be hoped those girls will fail to get places and many more as silly as they."

"But Tom, how splendid to earn money and be independent; able to help the poor and do a world of good."

"There are other ways of doing good Peggy. Can't you see how these women with homes and comfortable means fill the places needed by widows, orphans and the hundreds of struggling girls and wives; some, who by their work support families?"

A great silence fell upon the two.

"Tom—"

"Well Peg—"

"I am going to try and get into the Census in July!"

"The devil!"

"No, the Census!"

"Elizabeth Maria Seward!" Tom rose from the divan, and slammed himself into a chair by the fire, for the evening was chilly.

"I'm in dead earnest Tom, the senator from our old home has promised to give me one of his six appointments as soon as I pass the examinations."

Tom looked fully seven feet as he stood before his little yellow-haired sister.

"Peggy, I shall never consent to any such thing! You may cry and moan and pray and get into tantrums, but right here I draw the line. You! with every comfort, a beautiful home, begging a government position to work from 9 till 4 like a factory girl!"

The scarlet yarn ran swiftly through Peggy's fingers, as she quietly replied—

"Ladies work in all public offices, Tom."

"Of course they do! Noble womenly women, earn their daily bread and carry the burdens of needy, loved ones all through life. I honor them and work for them, that's the devil of it all! scraps of girls like you, queens of their homes, with abundance of means, filling the places needed by the army of less fortunate ones. I blush for any man who will allow his mother, wife, sweetheart or sister to draw from Uncle Sam one dollar, so long as he has health and brains to give them a home and the comforts of life. These girls Peggy use their money for furbelows and stuff!"

Another silence.

"Tom, dear, do you think the examinations are very difficult?"

Tom turned his head and took one sharp look at his sister's blue eyes and curly head, for very wonder at this audacious question after his fierce, decisive remarks. He actually smiled and asked sarcastically.

"How are you Peg on compound interest and partial payments, and where is Alaska or Idaho?"

The doorbell gave a furious ring. An imperative message from Newspaper Row. Tom banged the door and was gone.

The seeds of ambition for some reason had sprung up in Peggy's heart, and when wise Tom supposed that they, like Jonah's gourd, would soon perish, he was mistaken. She looked in the hall mirror, tucked Tom's big umbrella under her arm, pushed her curls severely back off her face, and said slowly, "Peg we'll try."

Long after midnight Tom dashed into his room, packed his bag and gathered together his papers.

"Peggy darling, off for Boston. Joe is very ill, must take his desk in Herald office; may be gone a month; get old Ellen to stay with you; have a good time child, and write me every day."

With two arms about his neck, curls tucked down on his breast, the softest, sweetest kisses on his lips, he only said:

"Good bye—sweet Peg—good bye—" with never a thought of Census appointments, again.

"Tom—oh, Tom stop a minute," called Peggy.

"Well, what is it?" shouted back Tom.

"You won't mind, will you? if I—if I pass—"

"No, no," and as Tom jumped on the car, he muttered: "pass—pass fiddlesticks! the darling goose, bless her! She's only talking to see what I'll say."

Tom said he didn't mind.

Peggy slipped off her wrapper, and hopped into bed with a smile.

"Yes—Peg—you and I will get into the Census!"

Six busy weeks for Tom in the Herald office. Six very busy interesting weeks for his little sister in Washington. Her examinations were royally passed, her appointment made with short delay and the quiet dignified Miss Elizabeth Seward gave entire satisfaction to her chief, and—to Peggy.

Newspaper Row and Tom's club gossiped a little; made wry faces and frowned; but Tom was out of their reach; and as for Tom's sister none thought it best to criticise.

"Joe Grey" came back to his desk, and Tom was going home.

"Seward," said one of the Boston Staff. "Know an Elizabeth Seward of Washington? maybe kin of yours?"

"Well," replied Tom, "rather near kin! What about her?"

Tom read the item in the morning Herald:

"Miss Elizabeth Seward, a young, beautiful Washington girl who has been from the first greatly interested with Mrs. John Russell Young, in the room for the blind, in the new library, has become a member of the society, and yesterday, placed in the home at her own expense, a lovely child—totally blind, whose mother is an invalid, and wholly without means. Miss Seward is one of our most enthusiastic workers in this good cause."

"How the deuce did Peg manage to save enough for that outlay. Queer she didn't consult me!" and all the way to Washington Tom thought upon this "fad" of Peggy's.

Never such a welcome home! never so beautiful a little sister, and good dinner, and sunshiny home!

"Peg you darling, tell me how you managed. I would have sent you more money, if you'd have let me into the secret."

"Tom, I earned money enough."

"Earned it."

"Yes, I've had one month's pay, and shall soon have another—and——"

"Peggy—did—you—did you——"

"Yes! you precious old stubborn Tom I did! I am a Census clerk! and you love me all the more! Don't you see how I am improved?"

CURRENT TOPICS IN AMERICAN HISTORY.

FOR several months, in fact, since the commencement of our late war, COMFORT has been giving short epitomes of the current history of America in connection with the war itself and the after events which were in themselves a part of the war. America by the outcome of this struggle has taken such an advanced position among the nations of the world that it is no longer possible to relate only those events which happen within our own borders to record the passing history of the Great Republic. For this reason, for a time at least, COMFORT will in each number publish a brief resume of the more important events in the happenings of the world, which more or less directly influence the history of our own country. Without a tempting so serious a work as a general history of our times, it will be COMFORT'S endeavor to point out some of the more important matters and to give its readers such information in a concise form as will enable them to understand some of the articles which are daily seen in the newspapers.

The entire American press has been full of Admiral Dewey for the past month and pictures of him in every possible pose, position and uniform have appeared on every hand. The country has been almost carried off its feet by this outbreak of Dewey enthusiasm. It is to be remembered that few people under forty years of age have the slightest recollection of the Civil War, its heroes and its battles. The Spanish War is the first conflict that a very large proportion of our citizens have been brought in contact with. Had the war lasted longer we should have looked at its events with more discrimination and have judged the events more evenly. As a matter of fact there has been a constant exaggeration of the late conflict largely brought about by sensational and modern journalism which seems to delight in magnifying most unimportant events. But to return to the central figure. Never in ancient or modern times in the whole history of the world has a returning conqueror been received by his people with the enthusiasm and applause that has greeted Admiral Dewey.

As has been told in these columns, he returned from Manila in a leisurely fashion, being received with the highest honors at every stopping place on his route, and finally leaving Gibraltar for the run to this side to be in season for his reception in New York, which was planned to take place September 29-30. As the Admiral himself remarked he has always had a habit of being a day or two early instead of an hour behind, and so to the surprise of every one the stately Olympia sailed into New York harbor early one morning just two days earlier than expected. From this moment the pent up enthusiasm was let loose and every kind of honor that patriotism could suggest was shown the hero of the day.

ADMIRAL GEORGE DEWEY.

The naval and land parades taking place on the days scheduled and the fireworks and electrical displays in the evening so far surpassed anything of the kind in modern history that there seems nothing to compare them with. Among the gorgeous decorations was the Triumphal Arch which appears at the head of this article, a free gift from the artists of the city. It is hoped that this wonderful piece of statuary will be reproduced in permanent form in place of the perishable material of which it was formed.

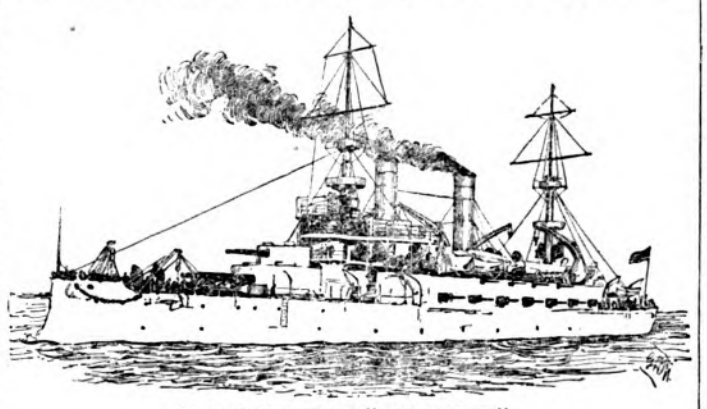
After the grand display in New York Admiral Dewey went to Washington where he was as enthusiastically received as the Nation's guest as he had been in New York itself. There is no doubt that the President has eagerly sought his advice in the Philippine question and that the result of these interviews will soon be apparent. Much to the surprise of many people, who hoped it would be otherwise, Admiral Dewey while not friendly to General Otis, seems to be the strongest supporter of expansion and does not hesitate to say that neither Cuban nor Filipinos are as yet prepared for self-government. It is to be regretted that the physical strain of the past two years and the further excitement of this remarkable reception have somewhat told upon his health.

EX-SENATOR J. W. BRADBURY.

Although the world has been flooded with pictures of Admiral Dewey, COMFORT is certain that the latest photograph which is here reproduced will please our readers and give them a correct idea of his present appearance.

Speaking of remarkable men we are reminded of the successful career of a statesman from the fact that he was recently indisposed, although rallying with remarkable vigor. Hon. James Ware Bradbury of Augusta, Maine, is a phenomenal figure in America's history and a man whose life brings us in touch with some of the most remarkable men in our own history. Senator Bradbury was born over ninety-seven years ago and went to the little red school house in a Maine village, afterwards studying at Parsonsfield Academy. In the class of 1825 at Bowdoin were graduated a number of distinguished men afterwards famous in literary and political life. Among the number were Franklin Pierce, afterwards President of the United States; Longfellow, the poet; Hawthorne, the author, and many others. Of this famous class Mr. Bradbury was a member. He came to Augusta as a young man and embarked in the profession of law.

From his success in this line he became a noted democratic leader in New England, and was elected to the United States Senate from Maine in the days of the great giants of debate and oratory, Clay, Benton, Calhoun, Webster. Since his retirement from Congress he has taken active interest in public affairs and no later than in the campaign of 1896 proclaimed himself in favor of a gold standard in a letter which for logic, power and vigor of thought was unsurpassed by any document of the campaign. Friends all over the Union hope that the grand old man may survive beyond the century mark.



The success of our navy in the Spanish war, and especially the magnificent reception of Admiral Dewey, have stimulated the great interest which was already felt in everything pertaining to our navy. The completion of two of the latest battleships of the new navy, in connection with the return of the great Admiral, cannot help calling to mind the men and material that form our navy, and which together have placed it in the high standing which it now occupies among the navies of the world. From a low class naval power, the United States within ten years has risen so rapidly that last year she stood fourth in the list of the naval powers of the world, a position which, so far as actual numerical strength is concerned, she will probably hold for some time, as but two nations are building ships faster than we are with the exception of Great Britain, whose policy always is to have a fleet equal to the combined fleets of any other two nations. But notwithstanding the inferiority in point of numbers, it is doubtful if any nation except Great Britain has really the naval power that the United States has at the present time. Last month the Kearsarge, the first of the two great battleships recently built, had her official trial and surprised both the contractors and the Government by making much more than the necessary contract time on this trip. By this performance she stamped herself as one of the swiftest battleships in the world.

CANDIDATE JOHN R. MCLEAN.

Our readers may often see accounts of official trials, and may not exactly know what is meant by some of the terms. In all European nations, a trial of any warship is made over a course of one measured mile, and figured out from that basis. By these means the engineers are able to "bottle up" steam until it reaches more than the desired pressure and then make a spurt for the one mile; but the tests of the United States Government are much more exacting, as the test has to be measured over an ocean course on a sustained speed of four hours, and including at least one complete turn instead of straight away. By these means, although these ships often reach a mile burst which would entitle them in any foreign navy to a rating of 20 knots or more an hour, the average for the four hours will bring them down to between 16 and 17 knots; so that although on paper it might seem that many English or French ships were much faster than the United States ships of the same class, it is undoubtedly true that the American ships on sustained speed excel anything built, and it is a question if any battleship could on a short race prove itself the superior. No battleship in the world has ever equalled the wonderful performance of the Oregon in her wonderful race around the Horn at a sustained speed.

The Kearsarge, which is shown in our illustration, is one of the most complete battleships in the world besides having immense battery strength, her weight has been greatly reduced by the double turret system which is an innovation. By this means her eight-inch guns are superimposed on the turret containing the thirteen-inch guns, so that the equipment for these turrets only weighs about two-thirds what it would if it were four distinct turrets. Other vessels, notable in their special classes, which are being built will be described at another time.

U. S. BATTLESHIP "KEARSARGE".

The preliminary skirmishes on the line of the great presidential contest which will take place next summer have already commenced. From the general appearance of the field at this time President McKinley is practically sure of the Republican nomination by acclamation. On the democratic side Mr. Bryan is again in the lead, though many of the party including the old "Gold democrats" desire to take another man. Much talk has been made for Admiral Dewey to stand as a candidate on account of his great popularity; but there is a general feeling that he is not in politics, although great pressure has been brought to bear on him since his return.

Otherwise it looks as if the two tickets of 1900 would be headed the same as four years ago. Vice President Hobart is not as well as his friends would wish and there have been many reports as to the nature and seriousness of the illness which have been met by the official announcement that he merely needs rest from overwork, and that he will both preside in the Senate this winter and be a candidate for the position again. If this prove true, the Republican nominations can hardly fail being the same. Whether General Sewall of Maine who ran with Mr. Bryan is again desirous of the nomination is unknown. He is a ship builder with large business interests and probably in his present time of prosperity is not thinking much of political advancement.

The most exciting campaign in a political sense is that being waged in the home state of President McKinley, Ohio. Here are three candidates, all doing effective work. The one who is being most considered is John McLean, the democratic candidate for Governor. The consequences of his election are appreciated on both sides as it is claimed his election would be looked on as a public disapproval of the administration's course in the Philippines and prove an opening gun in the next campaign. On the other hand it is believed that his election also means that he would be a most formidable rival for Col. Bryan for the democratic nomination for the presidency, while his defeat would insure a solid Bryan delegation from Ohio in the convention. Mr. McLean is a young man of much political experience and a leader in his party. He owns the Cincinnati Enquirer and with its influence and his great wealth has been a political power in Ohio for a number of years.

Aside from the Ohio campaign there are a number of minor contests going on in various States, none of which may be said to be of a national character although the probable issues of the next year appear in all. The nearest approach to it is the State contest in Nebraska, which only assumes magnified proportions from the fact that Col. Bryan has been on the stump himself and his daily speeches to large crowds are supposed to show the line of the next campaign. The general tone is anti-imperialism and anti-trusts. It is a singular thing but a National Campaign is seldom fought on the lines laid down a year ahead. Either the conditions change or some accident projects an unthought-of issue into the arena, and what was to have been the main question is entirely lost sight of. When Gen. Hancock was a nominee through a natural utterance on the tariff, the entire fight shifted from his war record to that issue in a week. So, too, only in 1896 the entire preliminary skirmishes had been based on tariff, which was entirely lost sight of by the unexpected appearance of the "16 to 1" silver question.

By this and many other instances it will be seen that the change of the Philippine situation which may take place any time might take away every ground that now exists for making that the one question of the campaign. What is true of that is also true of commercial questions; so, at present, it can hardly be said that definite lines of party division are as yet laid down.

The condition in the Philippines is about the same. The rainy season has about ceased and small expeditions are now being sent out from Manila occasionally, evidently with the intention of breaking up camps of insurgents. There are no organized battles fought but the columns of troops after a little skirmishing drive the insurgents and apparently break up their camps. Extended campaigns are not as yet practicable but the government is rapidly pushing forward reinforcements and supplies. There seems to be no doubt that it is intended to crush the forces of Aguinaldo before spring. Rumors of all kinds circulate in our press so that it is hard to determine the exact condition of matters in those islands. This is particularly true from the fact that almost everything under the present condition is tinged with politics. It would be much better to subdue the enemy first, then talk afterwards. The fact that Aguinaldo has released American prisoners and evidently desires recognition by this or some other government does not give the appearance that he is over-confident of a successful result for his cause. It is doubtful if his army would be in existence were it not buoyed up with the belief that American support and sympathy is rapidly growing for them, a report that is systematically encouraged and causes them to persevere in this rebellion.

the Rheumatic Cure demonstrated its wonderful curative power.

It has never failed to cure RHEUMATISM in any form, Acute or Chronic.

Here is what a Prominent Physician has to say who has had 35 years of active Practice of Medicine.

I have never before in my 35 years of practice of medicine given my testimonial or recommendation to any patent medicine, but there is a remedy, the result of which has come under my own observation; for there is no Disease which has so baffled the medical skill of all ages as Rheumatism and to find a Reliable remedy for the same. At last we have found it in "5 Drops," manufactured by the Swanson Rheumatic Cure Company, Chicago, Ill.

The "5 Drops" has proven itself wonderful for its curative power in Rheumatism, not as a Temporary Reliever only, but to give a Permanent Cure even in chronic cases. Sometime ago, I had among others several Rheumatic cases, under my treatment and prescribed for these patients the very best Remedies which I skillfully selected, but without desirable results. I then heard of "5 Drops" and of its Wonderful Cures, and prescribed it to a few patients who found relief from its use within a few days. After that I prescribed it to a great number and to my surprise, I will say that in the course of Two or Three Weeks after they had used "5 Drops" and "5 Drop" Plasters they were Cured.

Among these were a few who had, for a number of years, been suffering with Chronic Rheumatism, who had piloted themselves around on Crutches. They came to my office without Crutches and told me they were perfectly Well. They give all the credit to "5 Drops" and to "5 Drop" Plasters and this is their testimony to the Swanson Rheumatic Cure Company for their kindness and for the conscientious way in which they are placing these Wonderful Remedies among suffering humanity, which they told me to write to the Company as an acknowledgement.

As I have seen the Curative Power of "5 Drops" and "5 Drop" Plasters, in a great many instances, I can Truly recommend them and also that the firm is perfectly honest and reliable to deal with. C. A. Jackson, Physician and Surgeon, Kearney, Neb., Aug., 29, 1899.

How Long Have You Suffered With RHEUMATISM?
How Long Have You Read About "5 Drops" Without Taking Them?

Do you not think you have wasted precious time and suffered enough? If so, then try the "5 drops" and be promptly and permanently cured of your afflictions. "5 Drops" is a speedy and Sure Cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Sciatica, Lumbago (lame back), Kidney Diseases, Asthma, Hay-Fever, Dyspepsia, Catarrh of all kinds, Bronchitis, La Grippe, Headache, Nervous or Neuralgic, Heart Weakness, Dropsy, Earache, Spasmodic and Catarrhal Croup, Toothache, Nervousness, Sleeplessness, Creeping Numbness, Malaria, and kindred diseases. "5 Drops" has cured more people during the past four years, of the above named diseases than all other remedies known, and in case of Rheumatism is curing more than all the doctors, patent medicines, electric belts and batteries combined, for they cannot cure Chronic Rheumatism. Therefore, waste no more valuable time and money longer, but try "5 Drops" and be promptly CURED. "5 Drops" is not only the best medicine, but it is the cheapest, for a $1.00 bottle contains 300 doses. Price per bottle $1.00, prepaid by mail or express, or 6 bottles for $5.00. For the next 30 days we will send a 25c. sample FREE to any one sending 10 cents to pay for the mailing. Agents wanted. Men, Women and Things.

CONDUCTED BY JENNIE MELVENE DAVIS.

Rear Admiral Farquhar who relieved Rear Admiral Sampson of the command of the home squadron in October was the hero of the navy ten years ago. The men who have won fame through the war with Spain have held the attention of the public but Farquhar proved himself of the stuff from which heroes are made. It was he who commanded the flagship Frenton when the great storm in the Samoan harbor of Apia, wrecked six vessels and drowned one hundred and forty officers and men. The Frenton dragged her anchors and was drifting on the rocky shore when Admiral Farquhar ordered the entire crew into the rigging. The human sail kept the boat in position. Two American ships were drifting helplessly in the grasp of the hurricane when Farquhar ordered the flagship's band on deck and cheered the hearts of the Americans by the strains of the "Star Spangled Banner" that rose above the roar and crash of the awful storm. Again he led the Frenton's men when they cheered the British ship Calliope as it fought its way to the open sea. The Frenton was wrecked but the entire crew were saved and the brave commander was raised to the rank of Commodore and given the important part of the command of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. Admiral Farquhar was born in Pennsylvania and is now fifty-nine years of age. His first active service was on the African coast in an attempt to suppress the slave trade. While only a midshipman he captured a slaver. He served with credit during the Civil War and until 1871 was constantly at sea. He has had two assignments at the Naval Academy. He has been successively Commandant of the League Island Navy Yard at Philadelphia and the Norfolk Navy Yard. He asked for sea duty during the Spanish War but was detailed to remain in command at Norfolk where he fitted out the revenue cutters and other vessels. The daring and address that he showed during the awful scenes of the Samoan hurricane show one side of his character and the mastery of detail and executive ability displayed in the technical work of the Navy show another. Altogether, the North Atlantic Squadron can be proud of the personality and record of its commanding officer.

We have many miniature painters but Miss Laura Hills ranks among the best in America. What is most surprising is the fact that Miss Hills is almost self taught. She has had a few months' instruction in the Art Student's League of New York and in the Cowles Art School of Boston. Miss Hills was born in the quaint old town of Newburyport, Massachusetts, and still spends much of her time there although her winters are spent in Boston. Her first work was as an illustrator and many of her early drawings appeared in Saint Nicholas. She took up the study of pastel and it was from a sale of some of her work in this line that she was able to study in New York. Her success in the field of miniature painting was immediate. During the last five years she has painted the miniatures of many prominent society people and has won unstinted praise from the critics. Two years ago she was elected a member of the society of American Artists. Few women attain to this honor and Miss Hills is the first miniature painter ever chosen into this society. She is very near sighted but this seems to have helped instead of hindered her miniature work. Her tiny bits of ivory are perfect in detail and yet the sense of broad lines and race treatment is never lost. Miss Hills' studio on Boylston street in Boston is a study in green and gold and there she greets and entertains the friends that her charming personality and her work have brought her. She is very resourceful and has a talent for organization. It was she who planned and directed the "Pageant of the Year" a very successful spectacular production given in 1892. Her work is always prominent at all exhibitions of miniature painting.

Stephen Crane is one of the younger school of realistic semi-literary journalists. He came into public notice with a rocket-like brilliancy. His first book "The Black Riders" was verse and verse of a rather startling kind. The editor of the Bookman brought young Crane into notice by means of a very flattering review. He called him an original and powerful writer of eccentric verse—"one who stimulates thought because he himself thinks." His next book The Red Badge of Courage is said to be the most striking picture of the bare revolting facts of war ever written. At the time it was penned, Crane had never seen a battle. He says that he gained his knowledge from the sense of the rage of conflict given in the football fields. During the Spanish war Mr. Crane received an enormous salary as special correspondent of a New York city daily. Mr. Crane is a college man, having received his training at Layfayette College and Syracuse University. He has recently spent much time in England. His last book is called "War is Kind."

The Princess Adolphe de Wrede is a talented and beautiful woman who is seeking success as a concert singer. She has had a rather tragic life and has just finished a struggle in the courts for the legality of her title of princess. The princess is a Hungarian by birth and in early life was the wife of a Hungarian physician—Dr. Dobrzanski. They went to live in Russia and the marriage was annulled in that country. In 1891 in Paris, the lady married the Prince de Wrede. The Prince afterwards met a wealthy South American widow and succeeded in getting a Bavarian court to declare his first marriage illegal. Upon this he married the rich widow and the Princess de Wrede has since been fighting the matter in the French courts. She came to this country and sang at the French and German embassies in Washington. She has been taken up by the ultra fashionable set at Newport where she has been singing during the last summer. Her voice is remarkable for its range and sweetness. She sings in six languages; English, French, German, Italian, Russian and Hungarian. She was a pupil of Tosti. Her Hungarian folk songs have caught the popular fancy. The Princess wears most beautiful gowns and was especially admired in a rose satin empire gown. Her diamonds are very fine and altogether it is hard to realize that a woman of title with all the appearance of great wealth is really trying to make her way on the professional stage. The Princess has however the qualities that win popular approval and her pluck and her talent will win even without the interest that her romantic story and her society following will excite.

William K. Vanderbilt is a name known all over the world as a King of Millions, but of William K. Vanderbilt the man but little is known outside the circle of his intimate friends. Comparatively few people recognize him on the streets of New York. He has the reputation of being exclusive and taciturn but those who know him well always speak of kindliness of heart as one of his prominent characteristics. "Willie K." as he is often called is a grandson of the famous commodore who founded the great Vanderbilt fortune. He was educated at an academy in Geneva, Switzerland, but returned home at the age of nineteen to a clerkship in the treasurer's office of the New York Central railroad. He was shown no favors but was told that promotion depended solely on his merit. He demonstrated enough business ability to procure his transfer into the traffic department where he became acquainted with methods and detail of this line of railroading. He has never shown in his business career a fondness for detail and aside from his first experiences as a clerk leaves all this part of the work to subordinates. He has developed a great executive faculty and an ability for bold combinations and for seeing schemes that has revolutionized the Vanderbilt system and promises to extend it across the continent. During his apprenticeship as a clerk he was made director in several of the Vanderbilt lines. His fellow clerks remember him as quiet and unobtrusive, not unfriendly but little disposed to talk. He has always been rather a silent man. With his brother Cornelius he took his little turn in Wall street. His father had warned him to keep out of speculation but experience had to teach him and the experience cost his father many millions. It was said that "Willie K." was then put on an allowance of $50,000 a month—enough to live on but not enough for speculation. W. K. Vanderbilt has had charge of the western system of the Vanderbilt lines. He selects his men carefully but expects from each president of a line definite results. The men and measures needed to obtain these results are left entirely to the head of that line. Business men who know W. K. Vanderbilt best declare that his resourceful mind, force and energy would have made a fortune had he been a poor boy. As it was, he inherited over $70,000,000 and the fortune has grown in his hands. He is a man who enjoys the pleasures of life in a natural way. He is not yet fifty years of age, is fond of society, fond of yachting, of horses and of the country. He is known as a judge and patron of art and has one of the finest private collections of paintings in America. He is familiar with current literature and finds time to read even in the social and business rush. He had a large collection of rare books destroyed when his country home at Idlewild was burned this spring. It is said that from forty to fifty begging letters reach Mr. Vanderbilt every day but his secretary disposes of them. It is not easy to gain a personal interview with him but if one is had his courtesy and attention are fully given. Mr. Vanderbilt takes frequent trips abroad on his own yachts—the last one being on the Valiant. Mr. Vanderbilt's Fifth Avenue home is a copy of the wing of a famous French chateau. He is about to commence the rebuilding of Idlewild on a much more extensive scale. His son William K. Vanderbilt Jr. has recently married the great California heiress—Virginia Fair, while his daughter Consuelo is the beautiful young Duchess of Marlborough. Mr. Vanderbilt retained a dignified silence and gained the sympathy of the public through the trying publicity of his wife's divorce and marriage to O. H. P. Belmont. He has the respect of all who are associated with him in a business way and the love and admiration of the few who come near to the man and can see him rather than his millions.

Turkey's Consul General to America would pass for an American although he could speak no English less than twenty-one months ago. Mundji Bey is about thirty years of age, short of stature and with dark hair and eyes. He has a very plain little office in State street, New York. He shows a most loyal devotion to the Sultan or Sooltan as all natives pronounce the word. The Turks train their young men for the diplomatic service. Mundji Bey studied for five years in the Turkish Government's High School of Diplomacy at Constantinople and the diploma of that institution hangs on the cedar partition that divides his 10 by 12 office. His father was a Turkish Governor General so that Mundji Bey was born in the official circle. His diploma fitted him to be appointed as a Consul General Secretary of an Embassy or Chief of some department. He has been twelve years on the Sultan's service and a Consul for six years. He was in Greece when hostilities broke out between that country and Turkey and he was forced to return to Constantinople. Mundji Bey is very "up-to-date" in his appreciation of the possibilities of the diplomatic service. Literary diplomats are very popular and the Turkish Consul General can claim a place in this intellectual aristocracy of the political circles. He is the author of a number of novels in the Turkish language among them being "The Bitterness of Life," "The Run to Death" and "The Pink Handkerchief." The last book is founded upon some romantic incidents in his own life. He has also been a constant contributor to Turkish papers. His commission from the Sultan hangs on the wall of his office. The Sultan's signature appears at the top but to the uniniated it appears to be a strange and weird hieroglyphic. Mundji Bey speaks four languages and is ready to converse of Turkish customs and manners in any of them. The moment any topic having a political bearing is introduced he shows all the diplomacy of the Orient and refuses to enter into any discussion. He is very observant and very shrewd and studies the political life of this country very closely. Altogether he is an interesting type of the modern Turk.

IT CAN'T BE DONE.

No One Can Remain Well, No Chronic Disease Can be Cured Unless the Stomach is First Made Strong and Vigorous.

This is plain because every organ in the body depends on the stomach for its nourishment. Nerve, bone, sinew, blood are made from the food which the stomach converts to our use.

How useless to treat disease with this, that and the other remedy and neglect the most important of all, the stomach.

The earliest symptoms of indigestion are sour risings, bad taste in the mouth, gas in stomach and bowels, palpitation, all gone feeling, faintness, headaches, constipation; later comes loss of flesh, consumption, liver and heart troubles, kidney diseases, nervous prostration, all of which are the indirect result of poor nutrition.

Any person suffering from indigestion should make it a practice to take after each meal one of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, allowing it to dissolve in the mouth and thus mingle with the saliva and enter the stomach in the most natural way. These Tablets are highly recommended by Dr. Jennison because they are composed of the natural digestive acids and fruit essences which assist the stomach in digesting all wholesome food before it has time to ferment and sour.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are sold by druggists, full sized packages at 50 cents. They are also excellent for invalids and children. A book on stomach diseases and thousands of testimonials of genuine cures sent free by addressing F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich.

CONDUCTED BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

IF any one had believed that the day of the bicycle was over and that interest in wheeling is on the decline, attendance on the twentieth annual meeting of the League of American Wheelmen at Boston last August would have speedily convinced him to the contrary. It was estimated that over 20,000 wheelmen and women were in the thickest of it. Wheels were everywhere in evidence and the bicycle was king. The affair easily out-rivaled all previous occasions and the old, experienced wheelman who has attended these meets before met with hundreds, not to say thousands of familiar faces and exchanged the "glad hand" with as many more.

The first annual meeting of the L. A. W. was held in New York twenty years ago. The second was held in Boston at which time there was a membership of 1654 and an attendance of 750. Now the membership is considerably over 50,000. The third meeting was held in New York in '81 and the third in Chicago in '82 at which a new code of bylaws was adopted, providing for the election of a chief consul and representative based upon membership for all states in the Union. In '83 the League met in New York and paraded in Central Park when it adopted an official organ which has been continued ever since. The membership was then reported as 4250. The sixth annual meet was held in New York; seventh in Boston; eighth at St. Louis; ninth at Baltimore; 10th at Hagerstown; 11th at Niagara Falls; 12th at Detroit; 13th at Washington; 14th at Chicago; 15th at Denver; 16th at Asbury Park; 17th at Louisville; 18th at Philadelphia; 19th at Indianapolis, and the 20th was that in Boston last August.

In 1886 the League met its first opposition from the racing men and the racing board revolted and formed an association known as the American Cyclist's Union. This organization attempted to control the fall tournaments and to rule rather arbitrarily; but it only lived about a year and was followed by another association which struggled along for a couple of years or so and then died a natural death. The National Cyclist's Association has been its only successful opponent.

The history of the racing and the mile record in this country would make a thick book. Back in 1878, when H. M. Pope made a mile in 3m. 53s. his record was thought to be nothing short of marvelous; just as they used to think a trotting horse that could go at a "2.40" rate beat everything ever heard of; but the bicycle record, like the trotter's, has been steadily lowered. Several men have distinguished themselves but the honors of late years seem to be about easy between Major Taylor and McDuffee, that is taking an average of a number of years in succession. From 3m. 53s. the record has been brought down to one minute and twenty-two and two-fifths seconds. Doubtless another year it will be reduced still farther; although it does not now seem possible. The improvements in machines has of course largely to be credited with the lowering of the record. Following is the tabulated list of the record from the beginning, which I am sure my readers will be glad to see and those interested in the racing question will like to preserve:

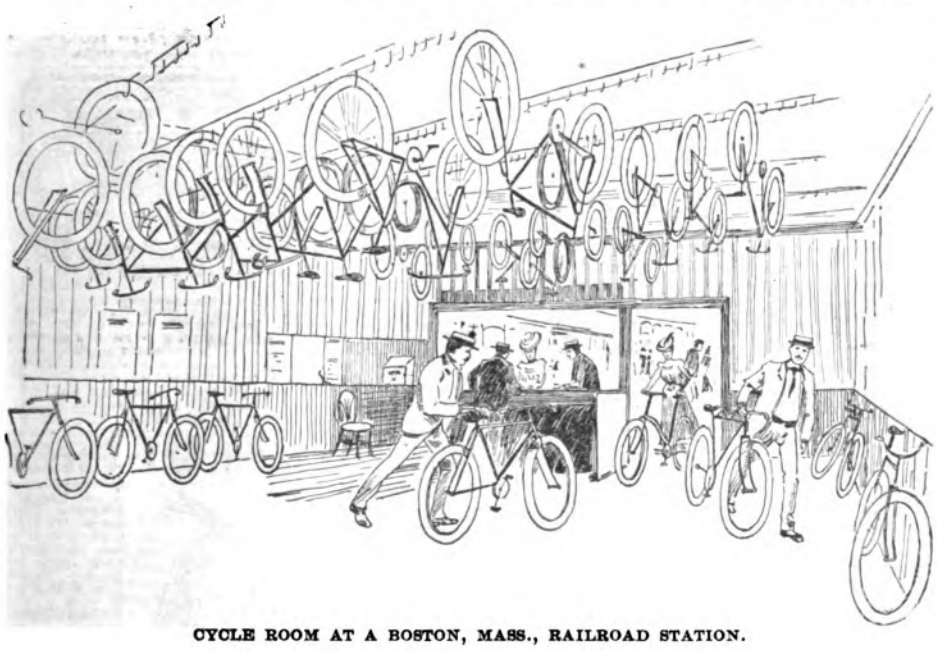
*Standing start. †Flying start. ‡Rejected. §Record not as yet accepted by national racing board.



This record shows the mile paced over which more money and energy have been spent than on any known record. And its growth marks the wonderful strides that have been made toward the perfection of the wheel and the equipment of tracks and pace-making machines, and recently of motor propulsion as well. But the record does not begin to tell the story; there is a volume behind it of the training and record-breaking camps, of hundreds of men employed, of specially constructive machines, of the wonderful care taken of the principal performer and his machine, of the large sums of money invested by manufacturers for advertising purposes, of the joy at triumph and the heart-breaking disappointments which follow upon success or defeat; and of a thousand and one minor details that cannot even be hinted at here.

The L. A. W. has now become one of the most powerful organizations in the country and the time has arrived when even politicians recognize it. Next year being presidential year, the League intends to push various schemes in the legislatures for the coming winter that will act in the interests of wheelmen. They will ask the legislators of different parties to place themselves on record as for or against wheelmen just previous to the great political struggle. They will get bills introduced to Congress which will include those intended to improve the highways, to force railroads to carry wheels as baggage in states which have not already conceded this point, and to make ordinances in each state uniform. As it is usually necessary to make a hard fight before the League can secure the passage of any bills, they are prepared this season to be unusually energetic as politicians will be more than ever willing to make concessions. It is expected that this campaign will not only be carried on in the different state legislatures but will also be pushed up to Congress as there are many ways in which that body can assist wheelmen. The L. A. W. is and has been for several months, preparing a vigorous campaign with their details all systematically arranged. And it is more than probable that they will have won signal victories and gained several important concessions before another summer comes.

The importance of good roads is something that interests more than wheelmen. Property owners everywhere are affected by it perhaps more than you think. As an example of the increased valuation of property caused by the improvement of roads, it is stated on good authority that in one year property in New Jersey county advanced nearly one million dollars. In the United States there are over a million miles of highway and the saving of a few cents per mile in the cost of hauling produce to and from railway stations would, it is said, aggregate a sum sufficient for the construction of all the roads now needed east of the Mississippi river. This seems like a large statement but it is given by officials who know their business.

It is estimated that to-day there is an annual output of over 500,000 bicycles and that there are over a million wheels in common use in the United States. The bicycle manufacture has given employment to thousands of men and has added very materially to the profitable business of the country. The perfection of the bicycle has opened a large market for steel and rubber, has revolutionized the methods of drawing seamless steel tubes and wonderfully improved the manufacture of all rubber goods. Instead of importing tubing from England as was formerly the custom, this product is now supplied by American makers, thus developing our home industries. There are hundreds of patented devices for covering tires and attaching them to the fellies, which have been patented here, to say nothing of the development of manufacturing saddles, lanterns, bells and other accessories.

Surely, the bicycle has been a boon to America as a country as well as to the individual rider whose name is legion.

WEAK LUNGS AND WASTING AWAY THE BANE OF WOMANHOOD.

THE FAMOUS SLOCUM TREATMENT CURING THOUSANDS IN EVERY STATE.

FREE TO EVERY READER OF COMFORT.

Thousands of women are wasting away day by day, week by week, month by month, through anxiety, overwork and motherhood.

Their once robust constitutions have been overtaxed, and the wasting away process has thrown them into decline.

From 150 pounds to the last bed of sickness, from which all hope has fled, is but a step or two.

How important, then, to check the consumptive germs in time?

Everyone who has weak lungs, who has a cough that does not mend, who has asthma, catarrh, or pulmonary trouble, the grip or its after effects, should without delay send for a full course of Dr. Slocum's famous FREE treatment which is sent free to all who apply.

Delay means but one ending—consumption.

Since the wonderful discoveries of Dr. Slocum have been brought to the attention of the medical world, the death rate has been greatly reduced.

Not only will the Slocum System of treatment cure all lung and pulmonary diseases, but even consumption itself, as has been proven by thousands of prominent physicians.

No matter how deep-seated the ailment, Dr. Slocum can cure it.

Mrs. Julia Glover, Easley, S. C., says:

"I contracted consumption in January, 1898. Three physicians failed to help me. Night sweats reduced me so I was but a wreck. After trying almost every means for getting well, I finally sent for a free course of treatment from Dr. Slocum, and it entirely cured me. To-day I weigh 191 pounds, and am a living example of the wonderful miracles he is performing everywhere."

The Slocum Treatment kills the deadly bacilli, imparts vigor to the body, and makes firm, healthy flesh.

In a word, it strengthens and builds up, making men, women and children stout and healthy, when all other means have failed.

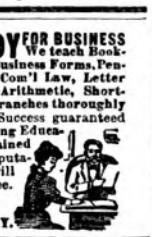
Now that the raw winds of fall and winter are at hand, Dr. Slocum proposes to further demonstrate his wonderful triumph by sending to every suffering reader of COMFORT a Full Free Course of the Four Preparations comprising the treatment.

Simply send your post office and express address, stating that you read the article in COMFORT, and the Free Course will reach you without delay.

WRITE THE DOCTOR.

Write Dr. T. A. Slocum, 98 Pine Street, New York, where his great laboratories and correspondence-consulting offices are located.

When in doubt as to your disease, or in need of advice, write the Doctor freely, and you will be told what to do.



EDITOR'S NOTE.—The Slocum Treatment is medicine reduced to an exact science, and this is an honest, straightforward offer made by the world's most famous physician. All readers of COMFORT anxious regarding the health of themselves, children, relatives or friends, can have Four Free Preparations, with complete directions for use in any case, by sending full address to Dr. Slocum's Laboratory, New York City. When writing the Doctor please say you saw this article in COMFORT.

THE PIN OF THE PERIOD.

DEWEY SWORD STICK PIN.

Now that Dewey has returned every man, woman and child in the country will want to wear one of these beautiful gilt emblems. The elegant sword voted by Congress to be presented to Admiral Dewey was presented to the hero of Manila by President McKinley early in October. This beautiful gilt emblematic stick pin sword is very strongly made, the blade has a sharp point and as the sword is warranted never to tarnish, it makes the most appropriate and useful souvenir of the season. Each sword comes mounted on Red, White and Blue cards three inches square and are selling by the thousand. Men wear them for neck tie pins, women wear them for dress, scarf and shirt waist pins, children wear them for all pin purposes and they will not tarnish so are the most popular and useful "Pin of the period." These sword pins sell for 25c. each, but knowing all patriotic people would want them a large lot were ordered, so will give one free with a subscription.

FREE Send 12c. for a three months' subscription to COMFORT, and we will send one free; send 30c. for a year's subscription and we will send three all charges paid, you can sell two for 50c. and make money. One dozen pins sent, all charges paid, for only one dollar. Get them quick and make two dollars clear. Now don't wait but write at once whether you want one or one hundred.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

LAVISH as was the display of splendid stuff last year, this season's outpouring seems to surpass anything ever yet attempted. Fancy fur combined with lace as a trimming, the fur appliqued on the lace or batiste, as is often the case, the pattern of more or less coarse design so as to give full sway to the fur ornamentation. One gorgeous piece of this trimming had the fur studded with jewels—turquoises being the stones chosen. Persian lamb appliqued on ecru lace, encrusted with pearls and coral makes a most effective decoration used on a gown of the new mode tint. The favored shade for dressy gowns for the coming season is biscuit in its various tones ranging from creamy tan to a pinkish dust color. Green, a shade quite brilliant and bordering on the emerald is also much in vogue and likely to find favor.

From Paris comes the cry, "down with habit backs," which means that the graceful skirt with no fullness at the back has had its day and, sorry as we are, we can but abide by it. Box pleats are given us instead. Pleats graduating from an inch in width to considerable of a flare at the foot. Sometimes one single pleat is all that is used, more often the pleat is doubled, however. Still the close sheath effect is guarded and one must look slim as a rail down to the knees where considerable flare is required. A novelty in skirts has its entire front breadth laid in tiny perpendicular tucks flying out loosely at the foot, the sides and back arranged in graduated box-pleats, each pleat stitched in pointed fashion from the belt to some distance below the hips.

For indoor wear the spencer waist is superseding the shirt waist, and is universally becoming alike to stout and slender figures. A dainty waist of this order is made up of pink and white striped taffeta, the stripes of equal width and so arranged in tucks at the yoke as to make the effect entirely white. It has a smart finish at the throat and belt of plain pink taffeta hemmed and brought into perky little bows at the front. Those neat little bits of linen hemstitched on the edges, worn over the ribbon at the neck are added to the smartest of gowns in a most taking way.

A clever girl of my acquaintance has an old-fashioned skirt of black taffeta flounced from the foot to the belt; of course this is terribly out of date, so to render it useful for dressy wear this winter she has ripped off all the flounces except those directly at the foot, and with four yards of new taffeta has fashioned an overdress, slightly pointed at the front and back, the edge set off by several rows of baby velvet ribbon, and a row of two-inch silk fringe. By the way; fringe is the accepted decoration of the season and is used on all manner of gowns to such an extent that it is likely to become common and vulgar; but until it does it will be hailed as something new and decidedly fetching.

An exquisite idea for a bodice to wear at evening functions, is made after the spencer model, composed of alternate rows of inch wide velvet ribbon and lace of half the width, the yellow tint preferred. The one I have in mind is pale blue with yellow lace insertion worn over a slip of creamy-white satin, the throat and belt are finished by ribbons of the blue brought into dainty knots at the front.

Gracefully hanging skirts of pale gray velvet or tan cloth are to take the place of the ubiquitous black skirt which has bored us for so many seasons.

Among the smartest hats shown is one of mouse gray felt in the sombrero shape, having a low round crown twisted about with two shades of gray velvet lined with satin of the same shade. These are knotted on the left side and through the knots are stuck two tiny golf clubs. Scarfs of silk of black or colors finished with a silk fringe on the edge are considered the correct adjunct to the up-to-date headgear. A smart hat of this style is in the popular "Rounder" shape in soft black felt, the low, indented crown encircled by the silk sash, the ends drooping low over the hair at the back, while a knot of the silk at the side holds a bunch of cocques jauntily in place.

A SMART WRAP.

Imported hats show a lavish use of strings and tulle scarfs which are vastly becoming, and yet fail to catch the fancy of our women who consider that they add to one's age however becoming they may be. Toques are more heavy and cumbersome than ever before it would seem, though they are wonderfully becoming and are usually heavy with birds or plumage of some sort.

Outre indeed are the long quills so many hats are displaying, some of them almost a half a yard in length, and give the wearer a somewhat grotesque look. Still they are stylish, and, of course, that is the only result many women aim for.

Poke bonnets are seen occasionally and are wonderfully becoming to a round, youthful face, filled in, as they are, underneath the brim, with softest linings of tulle, or chiffon of a becoming color. A dainty one in black velvet, the outside heavy with rich black plumes, has its brim faced with rose pink mirror velvet on which are set rows of shirred chiffon so arranged as to look like tiny roses; the ties are of black faced with pink.

A pretty little frock for a child's dancing party is shown here, made up in white Japanese silk, with yoke and sleeves of white lace over silk. The soft silk sash encircling the waist may be of any color desired, or the entire effect may be kept white.

A JAUNTY JACKET.

A smart wrap to be worn at afternoon or evening functions when one wishes to be especially well-dressed is given in the sketch—the snug little coat body is made up in a russet shade of velvet, very deep and warm in tone, the flaring collar is faced with the same, while the broad revers are faced with deep ecru lace over white satin—the material used in the outside of cape is a shade of biscuit-colored broadcloth, set off by rows of black chenille at the edge, and finished by a deep black silk fringe. The jaunty little jacket displays the new rolling collar now so much in evidence which may be of fur, or faced with velvet.

A smart house-gown of white wool, very soft and fine, has the quaint open fronted skirt showing the flounced petticoat of white taffeta, the upper part of the opening caught together by lacings of rose colored velvet.

MEXICAN BURDEN BEARERS.

TO the casual observer it would seem that all the burdens of Mexico are borne by the women and donkeys. Should you happen to be in the City of Mexico on Sunday, the principal market day of the poorer people, take your stand anywhere between the Plazza and San Juan market, and note the loads the women carry. Bales and a baby; boxes and a baby, bags and a baby, baskets and a baby, in fact everything that is being brought to the market, the inevitable baby being secured in the folds of the mother's rebose, (scarf) and riding astride her hips.

Note the family groups. Here is one that is typical of the Mexican Indian; in front comes the wife and mother, moving in the queer dogtrot that all American Indian women have, and almost hidden from view beneath a heavy load of garden truck she is bringing from the distant Chinampas. Behind her trudge two or three children, and bringing up the rear comes that lord of creation, the husband, astride the family donkey, serenely smoking his cigarette, and probably wondering why his wife moves so slowly.

But the men do their share of the burden bearing; all the material for building houses is carried up to place on their heads, backs, or shoulders, they seeming to be unable to learn that any other way is possible. When the railroads were being constructed, the Mexican laborer knew of no better way to move earth than to fill his leather apron, two corners tied securely to his waist, the others held in his hands, and to then walk to where the dirt was to be carried.

The contractors introduced the wheelbarrow, but what do you think. Four men would take a barrow, and having loaded it, would lift it to the head of one of the party, who would carry it thus to the dumping place.

THE water lily is said to be used in some parts of India for food. In Lake Cashmere there is a specie the fruit of which is rich in starch and has much the flavor of a chestnut. The nuts will keep for a long time when dried, and when ground they may be made into cakes or may be soaked and then boiled for some hours.

DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS:

Again has come around our yearly festive season of Thanksgiving, when all we good Americans "Tink ob our marcies," as the old colored woman expressed it. I hope we are none of us unmindful of the blessings that are strewn all along our way, but just now, when our harvests have been gathered in, and our winter supplies stored away, we have special reason for gratitude that "our wants are all supplied."

I feel particularly grateful to my nieces and nephews this month for so generously providing me with letters for my page. Our first letter was written last August, but as my August matter is sent in in June I think you will not object to reading it now.

"We have been making our first visit to the Pacific Coast this summer, and have seen a great many new and interesting things. I should like to tell you about them all, but that would take too long, so I am going to write only about our stay in this little village in northern California, nestled at the foot of Mt. Shasta. The inn at which we are staying is right in the midst of beautiful, great pines and cedars, with charming views in all directions. But most beautiful of all is the sight of the great mountain rising 14,440 feet above the sea, its summit and sides covered with snow.

"Long ages ago Shasta was an active volcano, pouring out great flows of lava, of which the present great mountain is the result. The crevices between these masses of lava rock have been filled with vast quantities of fine volcanic ash, blown from the great crater after the flow of fiery lava had subsided. On this mountain can be found all the phenomena of high Alpine regions, real glaciers flowing down into the valleys, tiny, deep blue glacial lakes, and sulphur springs which bubble up out of the rocks near the edge of the old crater.

"The water from the melting snow does not run down over the surface of the mountain, as one might expect, but sinks into the volcanic rock, appearing again at the base in immense springs. One of these is the source of the great Sacramento river, and from another is taken the 'Shasta soda' which is famous all over the west.

"Few people who come to the inn, except strong men, attempt to climb to the top of the mountain. Most people content themselves with easier and shorter excursions. A party of us went one day to visit a large lumber mill on the Sacramento, a forest murderer, I call it, it seems so wicked to cut down all these magnificent trees. Between the lumbermen and the fires, the fine forests of the Pacific Coast are rapidly disappearing, though our Government is at last awake to the situation and is taking steps to preserve them. We can only hope that laws will be made and enforced before it is too late. I was glad to meet one man with immense lumber interests, who told me he was replanting his land as fast as the timber is cut.

"Another interesting visit which we made was to a fish hatchery near by, one of seven maintained by the State. At the time of our visit, the ponds and breeding tanks were filled with trout of many varieties. Brook trout from New England, Lochleven trout from Scotland, brown trout from Germany, Dolly Varden and rainbow trout, were sporting about together in the beautiful, clear mountain water. These little ponds are very attractive to certain birds. Great blue herons and black and white king-fishers are almost always to be seen hovering about, waiting for a chance to dive down and bring up a fine speckled beauty.

"The men in charge of the hatching have orders to shoot every fish-loving bird in sight, though the State laws for the protection of birds are generally very strictly enforced, especially in behalf of the blue heron, which is said to be the best scavenger in the country. Just after we left the spot we heard the report of a shotgun, and the next morning a pair of great, stately blue wings were sent to us as a souvenir. Then we knew that one more blue heron had ceased its work, for good and ill, and that the heart of the keeper was glad."

Our second letter takes us to the other side of the United States, in the beautiful old State of Virginia.

"In an almost perfect climate, where the rigors of winter are softened by the warmth of the southern sun, and the heat of the summer is tempered by the cool breezes of the Chesapeake, more than four thousand of Uncle Sam's soldiers are waiting the setting of life's sun in the Home for disabled soldiers in Hampton, Virginia.

"It was in the summer of 1898 that we visited this Home in acceptance of an invitation from one of its inmates. It is indeed an ideal place for its purpose. The buildings overlook Hampton Road, where passes to and fro the traffic of the seas. The grounds are beautifully laid out, and carefully tended. The buildings are handsome, commodious, and models of convenience.

"One of the interesting features of the institution is the culinary department. In the kitchen we came upon an animated scene. Cooks in white caps and aprons were busy preparing dinner, and this is no small task. Seven barrels of potatoes, five of turnips or other vegetables, eight or ten barrels of flour, about two thousand pounds of meat, nearly a barrel of sugar, and quantities of other materials are used daily in preparing the meals for the veterans. Long rows of ranges contain the pans of meats and vegetables, and four copper boilers, each holding one hundred gallons, contain the coffee. We were told that eleven hundred and eighty-eight veterans are fed at one sitting.

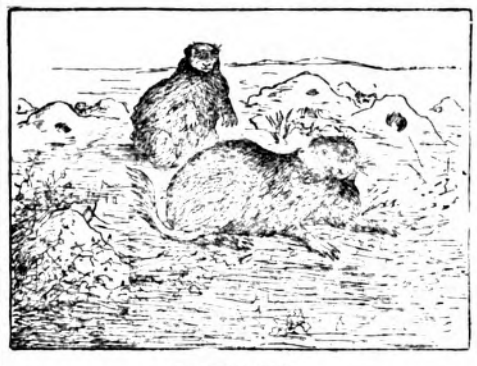
"At a signal from the bugle the doors of the dining-room are thrown open, and from the front and sides enter this army of eaters. A second signal seats them, and then another army of waiters files in from the kitchen bearing the smoking and savory dishes. There are twenty or twenty-two tables with three waiters for each table.

"The veterans are not without amusement. Upon the grounds is a well-equipped theater, the donation of Mr. Horatio Ward of London, England, at which are frequent entertainments. The most of these are free. There are also billiard parlors, a shooting gallery, bowling alley, and other pastimes. There is also a free reading room.

"The hospital is one of the important adjuncts of the Home. It has a capacity of five hundred patients. The sanitation is perfect, and hygiene is a hobby with the hospital managers.

"As we were leaving the grounds there passed us a covered wagon. Marching beside it, three on either side, were six men in blue uniforms. Within the wagon was a pine box, with the Stars and Stripes thrown across it. The wagon was going to the boat landing and the box was addressed to a town in Maine. Another soldier had gone home.



'After the battle, respite;
After their labor, rest;
A leisure hour in a shady bower,
Ere the sun sinks in the west.'"

FRED'K LEHR NEWLAND, Lucinda, Pa.

Our next letter gives some facts about that curious little animal, the prairie dog, that are new to me, and perhaps will be to some of my readers.

"Having lived in the west nearly all my life I am well acquainted with the curious little animal known as the prairie dog. He is not much of a dog, but looks very much like a monstrous rat; his yelp has more squirrel than dog in it, and he behaves like a woodchuck; so that while we call this 'ancient builder of cities' west of the Missouri a dog it is well to remember that this bushy little tail would wag as well under several other names.

"By his pertness, shyness, and innocence he makes himself a pet with travelers, ranchmen, and others who do not need for their own use those parts of the great plains where he and his tribe have long been 'squatter sovereigns.' When, however, the farmer comes along, and wants to sow and reap where the dog has made himself a home, he becomes a pest. He stubbornly refuses to yield to the newer civilization; he and his neighbors are too numerous to kill, and they are so skillful at dropping into their sand pits when an enemy comes near that their army seldom loses a man. If the farmer attempts to plough a section of the prairie where they burrow the chances are that his horses will break their legs, for the dogs have bored the ground full of holes, running straight down for eight or ten feet, and about the size of a horse's leg. If the leg comes out whole the ground is not half ploughed, for between the holes are mounds built out of the sand or soil so thrown out that it looks as if there had been a shower of large-sized chopping bowls all fallen bottom side up. Over these the team stumbles and the plough plunges in and out, and while the farmer, thus aggravated, loses his temper, the dog sits safely in his basement parlor, possibly smiling over the folly of man; for no sooner has the farmer left the field at sunset than the dog sets himself to spoiling men's earthworks and rebuilding his own, and the next morning's sun shines on the restored city of hillocks, each inhabitant sitting upright on the roof and calling a merry good-morning to his neighbors. If the farmer repeats his work so do the dogs, and while he grows poor at it they seem to make a good living. They are not disposed to 'move on' before white men. In the midst of a fine farming section in Nebraska, and near a city of three thousand people, there is a large prairie dog town which was settled when the 'oldest inhabitant,' pitched his tent in that section, thirty years ago. But ordinarily they manifest a respect for agriculture by locating in sandy, sterile tracts.

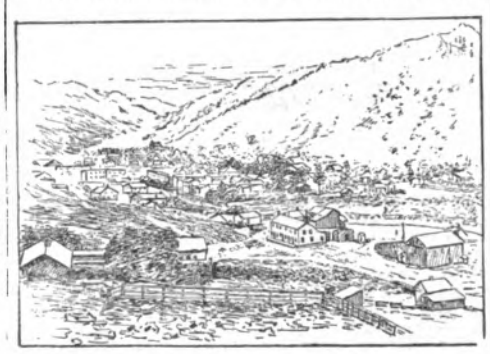
"The prairie dog's head is rather flat, his ears small, his eye bright, his nose hawk-billed, his jaws broad and his teeth wide and sharp; of these teeth he makes a mowing machine, clipping blades of grass for his breakfast as neatly as if it were done with scissors. His legs are short and his paws broad, making regular dirt paddles. Each member of the community has his own cellar door to the underground city, but ten feet below the surface each citizen's private apartment opens into his neighbor's; so that in a city containing ten thousand dogs if one is pursued into his hole by smoke, water or other enemy he has many avenues of escape. Their escape is inward and invariably successful, for pursuit is impossible. They have for their companions the snake and the ground owl. Even the most skilful hunters find it difficult to kill these animals. They scent danger afar off, and have a pretty correct idea of rifle range."

SIGNORA CRAWFORD.
Clifton Forge, Virginia.

Bessie C. Hall, Nominy Grove, Va., sends us a pleasant letter on Cabin John Bridge, but so many descriptions of this famous bridge have been published that I can only print a part of it. She says:

"When I was in Washington last it was with much pleasure that I visited Cabin John Bridge, through which the water supply of the city of Washington is conveyed over Cabin John Creek. This bridge is remarkable for having the longest stone arch in the world. The arch has a clear spring of two hundred and twenty feet, and is said to be twenty feet longer than the arch of the Grosvenor Bridge which spans the River Dee.



"Cabin John Bridge is built of granite with a Seneca stone coping along the roadway. In length it measures four hundred and fifty feet, in height one hundred and five feet. It cost $237.000 and is claimed to stand unsurpassed in the history of bridge building."

The following extracts are taken from a private letter to myself from a cousin in Summit County, Colorado, but they are so interesting in showing what can be done in the way of making her way in the world by a woman of energy and pluck, that I cannot forbear printing them for the benefit of my nieces and nephews, reserving, however, the name of the writer.

"I have mining property here which will be of great value when developed, yet I am now obliged to suffer for the want of the necessaries of life. For two years I have done my own assessment; I have two claims on the same lode, and the law requires one hundred dollars' worth of work for each claim. I did sixty-seven days' work, myself, last summer, which at three dollars per day amounted to two hundred dollars. The law allows three dollars per day on assessment to a woman as well as a man, but I cannot work at rock-breaking; I cannot strike it myself. I can only work on the surface, making roads, etc. I hope to be able to raise money now in a few weeks to put miners at work."

Now let us go to the Argentine Pass, the place whence "the waters run both ways."

"Argentine Pass, which is, I believe, the highest wagon road in the world, is in the Rocky Mountains about ten miles above Georgetown, Colorado. It is thirteen thousand four hundred feet above sea level, and from its summit may be seen at the same time the sources of two rivers, one on the Atlantic and the other on the Pacific slope.

"Around us are the flowery slopes and cool and crystal waters; while beyond innumerable mountains of every conceivable form and shape loom up on every side, many of them snow capped. We know not whether to say beautiful or grand; it is both, and as we gaze upon the awful sublimity of the scene our hearts go out with awe and reverence 'from nature unto nature's God.'

"The road on the Pacific slope follows the course of the Snake river, so named, I presume, on account of the serpentine path which it describes as it descends the mountain. The road is cut into the mountain side, and while on the left, as you go down, the mountain rises above you, on your right is a precipice hundreds of feet deep, at the base of which the river throws up the white spray as it dashes over its rocky bed. The road is so narrow that two teams cannot pass each other, and it winds around the mountain so abruptly that you can only see a few feet ahead.

"The first time we crossed the pass the driver told us that once, while on the road, he met a loaded team, and as his wagon was empty they unhitched his horses, led them by in single file, and then took the wagon to pieces, carried the pieces by, set up the wagon and hitched up the horses again before he could go on."

MRS. F. A. MITCHELL, Montezuma, Colorado.

Our next letter is from a boy at the Farm School on Thompson's Island, Boston Harbor. It is not often that I print the letters of children, for this is entirely a grown people's page, but this is so well written and expressed, and withal so interesting that I decided to give it place among the letters of older people.

"It may seem funny to talk about having spiders for pets, but every summer since I have been at the school there have been as many as a hundred spiders in the flower gardens, which the boys have had as their pets. There are about a hundred boys at the school, and each boy can have a garden. If he wants to have spiders for pets he gets permission to go down in the meadow to hunt for them. Then he brings them up to his garden and puts them on some plant. Soon the spider will spin a web and settle down to business and make himself at home. The boys bring the spiders up from the meadow in their hats and often carry them around in that way, wearing the hats on their heads. They never think of being afraid of the spiders.

"There are four kinds of spiders that the boys keep. One they call 'goldy.' This is the largest, and is spotted with two lines of gold running along his back. The 'silver' is a spry and good-looking fellow. If a fly gets in his web he is gone for sure. Sometimes the boys try to fool this fellow by putting a wasp or a bee in his web, but the spider seems to know that if he gets near he will be hurt, so he remains away and shakes the web until they drop out. Then there is the 'funny fellow.' They call him this because he is so lubbery, and makes his web so strong as to stop anything which might fly or hop into it. He builds himself a den by pulling two large leaves together and fastening them with his web. He will not come out until he is sure of something to eat. The 'brass back' is the smallest. The way he lives is to make a web across some plant, facing the sky, so if a mosquito should light there it would be easy to get him before he could get away. He is of a brass color, and is the smallest of all, but is the quickest and the easiest scared.

When the spiders want to lay eggs they eat their webs and drop down to the ground to search for a place in which to lay. If this letter was not so long I would tell you how the boys save the eggs, and how they make the spiders fight. Perhaps I will write that in another letter.

CHESTER O SANBORN

Our next letter describes an old Virginia church. This good old state is rich in the possession of many such antiquities.

"In northeastern Virginia, near the river Potomac, in the county of Westmoreland, so famous in colonial history, stands an antique stone edifice, 'Yeocomoco' church. This building is situated in a lovely valley shaded by magnificent oak trees. Here, in days long gone by, worshipped, among other illustrious men and women, the famous Washingtons and Lees of our beloved land, and in the spacious 'city of the dead' which surrounds the structure, sleep the remains of hundreds of the departed who have been potent factors in the upbuilding of the United States.

"As the ponderous iron gate swings open to admit the visitor within the massive stone wall encircling the grounds, he sees before him the beautiful, quiet cemetery lying between himself and the portal of the sacred edifice he has come to see. Hundreds of monuments are there, each recording the name and virtues of some long departed man or woman who once played an active part in the history of the country. Entering the building we seat ourselves in the old square pews which tower above our heads as we sit, and once ensconced in their upholstered interior one is free from all scrutinizing stares. There stands the old pulpit, far up above the congregation, who, doubtless, were obliged to crane their necks in order to behold the speaker. There by the chancel stands the font from which Washington received baptism, and there, above the pulpit, hangs the old sounding board which has many times thrown back to the congregation below the thunders of admonition and denunciation uttered by the preacher.

"But before we depart we must visit the old spring, from which so many cooling draughts have been eagerly received by thirsty pilgrims, and from an iron dipper chained to a beech-tree by its side let us partake of the clear, refreshing water, and then, stopping only to inscribe our names on the trunk of the old tree where thousands of other travelers have done the same before us, we reluctantly leave the place.

IRA G. LEWIS, Village, Va.

I have here a piece of fiction by Miss Deborah Bass, of Littleton, N. H., which is very well written, but which I cannot print simply because I do not use stories of any kind. I thank her for it however.

Another frequent correspondent of ours complains because Aunt Minerva is not willing to correct his bad punctuation, spelling, writing and grammar and then give him a prize for his letter. Now, I don't think that would be a bit fair to the other cousins who take pains with their letters and so deserve the prizes. When he sends me a letter which is worthy of a prize I have always given him one.

And now, with thanks for past favors, and hopes for more to come I am your very loving Human Babies and Other Babies.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY DR. WILLIAM A. HAMMOND, SURGEON GENERAL U. S. ARMY, RETIRED.

A BABY is a surprisingly stupid creature, all things considered. It seems to have a mental apparatus less well developed than that of any other animal, in infancy—a fact surprising enough when one considers the enormous mental superiority which it attains later in life over all the brute creation. A monkey is ever so much smarter than a very young child, age for age, and when two weeks old it knows as much as the latter knows at six months.

Now, it may perhaps be interesting to put together a few facts, for purposes of comparison, regarding the mental development of various animals in infancy. While the baby stands at the foot of the list, it is only just to negro infants to state that they are very much brighter than white infants; they look more intelligent, their perceptions are more acute, and their minds expand more rapidly. A two-year-old colored child, ordinarily, is far ahead mentally of a white child at the same age, and this superiority continues up to about five years, after which the white youngster passes the other and quickly forges ahead.

But a monkey baby is far more clever than any human baby. I once saw, at the Aquarium in New York City, a chimpanzee mother nursing her sick infant, only a few days old, whose behavior was in all respects like that of a human youngster of six months. Its mamma, evidently suffering all the pangs of maternal anxiety in its behalf, bestowed upon it just such endearments as a woman would give to her child, and it returned her solicitude with looks and actions of intelligent affection. It is a notable fact that among animals generally, baring man, the female monkey continues her care for her offspring longest.

The law in nature seems to be that those animals which stand highest in the scale of creation develop slowest mentally. Thus the white human infant is at the foot of the list in respect to intelligence; the negro infant comes next—I purposely leave the brown and yellow races out of the discussion, because the study of this subject has not been extended to them—the monkey is next in order, and so on. A dog baby, following the law referred to, exhibits more intelligence when very young than a monkey baby. I myself have made some quite elaborate experiments with puppies, and have obtained most interesting results. If you take a pup three weeks old, which has never tasted anything but milk, and hold out to it something in your hand, it will come to it in the belief that it is food; but no human infant under six months can be taught to hold out its hand for a thing, though a colored child will do it a month sooner than a white child.

Hold out a lighted cigar to an inexperienced puppy, and he will come to it promptly and burn his nose. Under no circumstances, however, can he be persuaded to approach the cigar a second time. Having given marked evidence of disapprobation and physical suffering, he retires in disgust and sets down the unpleasantness among his never-to-be-forgotten memories. Henceforth a cigar is something for him to avoid, and the lesson is learned thoroughly and finally. But try the same trick on a baby, using, let us say, a metal object that is heated just enough to be painful to grasp. The child will accept it, drop it, and cry, time after time, requiring dozens of repetitions of the experience before it will refuse to be further victimized.

There can be no better evidence of the superiority of the dog baby to the human baby in respect to intelligence than is afforded by such an experiment as this. The puppy puts together cause and effect, draws a conclusion unfavorable to lighted cigars as affecting the canine system, and forms a decision in consequence. On the other hand, the comparatively unintelligent infant perceives merely a discomfort, sets up a howl, indulges in no reasoning whatever on the subject, and is ready to repeat the same imprudence over and over again. Only after a great many repetitions of the performance does the fact trickle through its dull brain that, inasmuch as pain invariably follows contact with the metal object, the latter is a good thing to keep away from.

Galen, a famous philosopher and one of the fathers of medicine, made an interesting test of the intelligence of a newborn goat which had not even tasted its mother's milk. He placed the little animal in the middle of a circle of small pans containing different kinds of milk. One of the receptacles held asse's milk, another mare's milk, another cow's milk, another sheep's milk, and another goat's milk. The kid smelt of them all carefully in turn, but refused to touch any of the milks until it came to the goat's which it proceeded to drink up until the pan was empty. Some people would call this an exhibition of instinct, but I would rather be disposed to regard it as an operation of judgment, which was intelligently formed upon the sense of smell.

It has long been popularly supposed that animals other than man were mere automata, being gifted by nature with a species of mechanical impulse in lieu of intelligence, in obedience to which they did whatever was required for their own preservation and so forth. Even the great philosopher Descartes endorsed this idea. However, we know a great deal more nowadays than was understood in his time about natural laws, and we have come to realize that the lower animals do actually possess minds like ours, the difference being not of kind but only of degree. They are reasoning beings, but they cannot reason so well as we do, because their brain structure is not equal to ours.

Take the dog for example. There is not a single faculty belonging to man that is not possessed by the dog. He has judgment, and on the whole he uses it wisely, so that we justly regard him as the most intelligent of beasts, with the exception of the monkey. He has an excellent memory, and his senses are more acute than ours are. He knows the difference between right and wrong, as his actions often testify. His emotional system is highly developed. His affection for his master is proverbial; he is jealous on occasions, and he indulges hatred toward persons who are unkind to him. It may even be said that he has the religious impulse, inasmuch as that is only another term for veneration, and he has the highest veneration for his master, who to him is as a God. Some one has gone so far as to suggest that from his view-point the master is only a very superior and powerful kind of a dog, whom it behooves him to follow and to obey as the wild dog in a state of nature follows and obeys the leader of the pack.

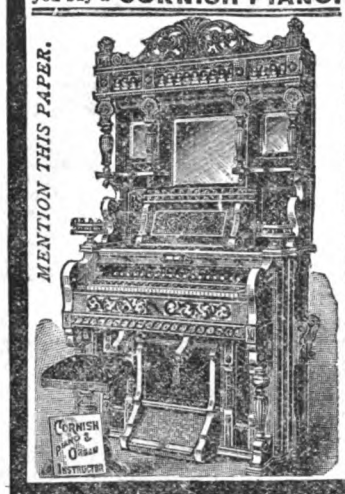
What is commonly known as instinct is inherited experience, of which various animals possess different amounts and kinds. A newly-hatched chick has already solved the extremely difficult problems of equilibrium and locomotion on two legs, and, as soon as its downy baby-feathers are dry, is able to walk about and pick up the food to which its attention is called by the maternal cluck. In point of intelligence, as well as of ability to take care of itself, a chicken twenty-four hours old is vastly superior to a year-old human infant. The latter, you see, possesses almost no instinct at all; in other words, it inherits hardly any experience. It knows how to suck, but beyond that nothing.

Instinct may be defined as a kind of intelligence that is born in the animal; it precedes knowledge and reason. Probably it will always remain more or less a mystery. Nature thinks and acts for us in an infinity of ways which we are not able to comprehend, and one of the ways in which she does it is through the gift of instinct. Certain instincts seem to be developed later in life—as, for example, the social instinct and the instinct of self-preservation. These are considered by the philosopher Voison as primary faculties, not acquired by experience, but originally bestowed with the life of the individual.

The definition of instinct as inherited experience seems justified by observation of cases where animals have developed new instincts in the course of generations. It is probable that most mammals and birds were not originally afraid of man, but that, having discovered that he is the most cruel and predatory of all living creatures, they have learned to fear him, and even their young now entertain a distrust of his intentions of them. Ducks and other water-birds in regions not often visited by human beings are apt to exhibit entire fearlessness of man. On the other hand, the domestic animals in the course of generations have come to have confidence in humankind.

One of the most familiar illustrations of the operation of instinct is afforded by the newly-hatched duck, which, though brought into the world by a hen, makes for the water directly after chipping the shell and thereupon proceeds to swim as well as if it had had a lifetime of experience in the art of natation. One point worth mentioning in this connection has to do with the mistaken popular notion to the effect that instinct in animals, being a kind of intelligence divinely implanted, cannot err. This is wholly an error, inasmuch as instincts are often at fault and sometimes grossly perverted. The instinct of mother-love for her offspring is occasionally inverted, her affection being turned to hate. Many known species of animals devour their own young on occasions.

I am sure that plants as well as animals possess instinct—that is to say, a force co-existent with their growth and implanted originally with the seed from which they sprouted. This instinct impels them to the performance of actions calculated to preserve their existence and to secure their well-being. Thus they reach their tendrils in search of support, and send their rootlets deep down into the earth in pursuit of moisture when the weather is dry. Likewise through the operation of instinct, they open their flowers in the morning and close them in the evening. Nor are these operations due to the heat or light of the sun's rays, inasmuch as they are performed when both are excluded. The sunflower turns its face toward the solar orb at all hours of the day, and it does the same thing when covered with an india-rubber tent, as I myself have ascertained by experiment.



The faculty of instinct in plants stands in place of reason, which they do not possess. So far as I am able to perceive, the instinct of plants differs in no essential respect from that of animals, though its manifestations are different. Instinct is implanted in all living beings from their beginning, and is a necessary part of their constitution.

The Kola Plant.

THE Kola Plant CURES ASTHMA

Free. The African Kola Plant is Nature's Positive Cure for Asthma. In the short time since its discovery this remarkable botanical product has come into universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America as an unfailing Specific Cure for every form of Asthma. Its cures are really marvelous. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, West Virginia, writes to the New York World, on July 23rd, that it cured him of Asthma of thirty years' standing, and Mrs. E. Johnson, of No 417 Second St., Washington, D. C. testifies that for years she had to sleep propped up in a chair unable to lie down, night or day. The Kola Plant cured her at once. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, editor of the Farmer's Magazine of Washington, D. C., was also cured when he could not lie down for fear of choking. Many other sufferers including Rev. S. H. Eisenberg, Centre Hall, Pa., and Rev. John L. Moore, Alice, S. C., give similar testimony, proving it truly a wonderful remedy. If you suffer from Asthma in any form, in order to prove the power of this new botanical discovery, we will send you one Large Case by mail entirely free. All we request in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. It costs you absolutely nothing. Send your address to The Kola Importing Company, No. 1168 Broadway, New York.

CONFECTION, FOOD, MEDICINE.

[TRADE MARK.]

Two Thousand Packages Shelled Peanuts SENT FREE.

SELL 12 PACKAGES AND GET A WATCH.

The art of shelling and salting peanuts has just reached perfection. As a confection they are peerless, as a food unequaled. German scientists have spent years experimenting with Peanut flour. It is found to contain three times the nutriment of wheat; and whole salted peanuts, being so much more palatable than wheat, have also been found with a slight addition of Pepsin Salt to be a sure cure for Dyspepsia and other stomach, kidney and liver troubles. Yes, even persons with Bright's Disease or Diabetes can now be cured. It is only necessary for old or young to eat a few of our Pepsin Salted Peanuts after meals to keep in perfect health—but they can also be eaten in any quantity as a confection without the least distress or trouble to the weakest stomach. Children delight to feast on them and they are much better than candy. They also cure Heart Burn and Insomnia.

To Form Part of the Treat or Refreshments at party gatherings, sociables, etc., they are indispensable, and to have them on the table as dessert is the best of form. Everyone, both old and young, now wants a few in the pocket at all times to nibble on—for with all the troublesome oils properly treated as they are in our special process of Curing and Roasting Peanuts, they have at last lost all terrors to weak stomachs, and are warranted not to become rancid, and to keep well in any climate.

FREE We will send two thousand packages of these Pepsin Salted Peanuts out to responsible parties who furnish proper references. You sell 12 ten-cent packages and get a watch, a guaranteed good timekeeper. But to first introduce them quickly we send one package as a sample free to any one enclosing six cents for a three months' subscription to COMFORT. MASASHI KOBAYASHI.

JAPAN AND HER PEOPLE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

In many respects Japan is a most remarkable country. For thousands of years ignorance and superstition had reigned. No foreigners were allowed to enter the country, all ports were closed to vessels of other countries for the people regarded them as devils. Shipwrecked sailors who were fortunate to get back home had marvelous tales to tell of Japan, and they with the exception of a few intrepid missionaries were the only ones who had ever seen the interior of this strange country. In 1872 Commodore Perry sailed into Mississippi Bay, with a commission from the United States to introduce Japan to open her ports to foreigners. In 1872, for the first time in 1000 years, the Mikado appeared to his subjects in person. Before this time the Shogun, acting as prime minister, had been the real head of the empire. The change was made in the form of government to a constitutional monarchy. Ports were opened to foreign vessels, and since that time the Japanese have made the most wonderful advancement, until at the present day the nation takes its place among the great powers of the civilized world, the youngest, though by no means the least important member of the family.

As a people the Japanese are remarkably intelligent, scrupulously clean, and in manners and words might be copied to advantage by most of other nations. They have been called by one writer the "French of Asia," on account of their extreme politeness. They are modest and gentle, sensitive and fond of flowers and animals. Each month of the year they celebrate the blossoming of some of the flowers. On these festal days crowds of people leave for the country to enjoy the beauties of nature. In the spring the cherry-trees, in the summer the chrysanthemums and in the winter the snow-covered trees make beautiful spectacles—keenly enjoyed by these gentle people.

The people in their religion are divided into three groups, the Shintoists, or idolates, Buddists, and Christians. Shintoism is now becoming less prevalent, while Christianity is gaining daily in strength. Buddism is still important, and it is on account of the teachings of this religion that the people have such respect for domestic animals. According to Buddism, the soul of a dead person enters the body of some animal. Therefore the good Buddists eat no meat lest perchance they carelessly swallow the soul of some ancestor.

A curious custom prevails at Mikado, the sacred place of temples where all pilgrims go. Here idols are placed in various shrines. The worshippers write their prayers on a piece of paper, chew the paper into a ball, and throw it at the idol. Should the religious spitball strike the face of the idol and stick it is a good omen—the prayer will be answered. Should it stick to the body it is a less favorable sign. Should it fall to the ground, there is no hope for the petitioner.

TORII.

The entrance to the shrines is marked with what are called "torii." These are formed by two, a posts on either side of the path, slightly converging. Across the top is placed a beam with the ends bent slightly upward. Some authorities say these are for the birds to perch upon, as birds are regarded as direct messengers to heaven. Others assert that the shape of the torii is in imitation of the Chinese character representing heaven.

The family life of the Japanese is radically different from ours. The father is the head of the family and all live under one roof. On the death of the father the authority falls to the eldest son, who must accept it or be forever disgraced. He directs the rest in everything that they do, and pays all their bills. If a younger son marries the head of the family pays all his bills and the younger son then lives at home. Should there be no son the eldest daughter must ask somebody to marry her. Her husband takes the wife's name, and becomes head of the family. Women have the pleasure of asking men to marry them. In case she is accepted the man takes her name. In case the man asks her, she takes his name. The younger sons are allowed to leave the family and become the head of a family of their own. This has to be done by petition. The eldest son is denied this privilege. It may be easily imagined that the eldest son therefore is not always in an enviable position.

In many of their customs the Japanese are radically different from us. As a nation of respect we stand—they sit. We take off our hats in the house they off their shoes. Our mourning color is black—theirs is white; we drive a horse into a stable, they back him in; they read from right to left, we from left to right; we write across the page—they write up and down. The houses in the larger towns are numbered in the order in which they are built, thus an old house may be number 2, while the next one if recently built may be number 2000.

Twenty-five years ago there were no public schools in Japan, and the young men who wished for an education were obliged to go to America. To-day there are excellent schools and colleges there with as good a system as can be found anywhere. Foreign teachers were called in, and schools for mathematics, astronomy, chemistry, geology, civil government, electrical engineering, naval construction modern languages, law, medicine and other branches were established. There is also an excellent school for the deaf and blind.

When the change came, the Japanese were so eager to adopt new methods and new customs that the emperor was obliged to restrain his subjects from abandoning all their old ways. He was successful in so doing and now while civilization has changed the people somewhat, in their home life, theaters, shops, festivals, and many habits, they remain unchanged.

Railroads equipped with the finest engines, cars and other material from the best American shops are popular in Japan as are also "ginoricksha," a sort of overgrown baby carriage drawn by manpower, and the even more primitive "Kago" a sort of sedan chair or hammock swung on a pole of bamboo, and carried by two men. These men are splendid specimens of athletes. They can travel 10 miles an hour, carrying a passenger, and keep up this place all day if necessary, with no apparent discomfort. They wear little clothing even in winter except a sort of cape of straw in rainy weather. The farmers also go almost entirely naked even in severe winter weather without seeming to feel the cold. European dress is now being largely worn in the cities, however.

Japan will soon be the equal of any country on the globe. To-day her schools are as fine as any—her people are learning mechanic arts rapidly, her army is composed of fine, well-drilled and well-officered men, while her navy, equipped with the latest modern warships is formidable indeed. No better example of her superiority on the sea could perhaps be shown than her late war with China, where the difference between modern progressiveness and ancient conservatism was so marked as to be almost pitiful.

Haciendo Del Oso (Playing the Bear.)

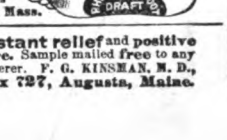
WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE customs governing love-making in countries whose people are of the Spanish race would drive the average American youth to despair. The usual course of procedure in a love affair is this: A young man sees somewhere a young woman who attracts him, in other words he falls in love with her at first sight, or thinks he does, which amounts to the same thing, and if he does not already know who she is and where she lives, he hastens to find out.

He wastes no time in seeking a formal introduction, for that he well knows is unobtainable, but he begins promenading back and forth where he can be seen by the young woman from her little cage of a balcony, and this from the walking to and fro like a chained animal, is called "haciendo del oso" (playing the bear). La Senorita is quick to note and understand his actions, and if she is not pleased with his appearance, or for any other reason does not wish his attentions, she gives no response to his meaning glances and theatrical demonstrations of blissful pain, but turns her back upon him, practically saying, "Go away, I do not like you."

On the other hand, if she wishes to encourage him, she looks at him tenderly and gives him an occasional smile, and both being acquainted with the language of the eye and fan, they soon reach an understanding although not a word has been spoken. Thus encouraged, the young man continues day after day, sometimes, but only in rare instances, for years, to walk to and fro in sight of his sweetheart. Usually, however, after a period of promenading and serenading, and smiling and sighing, in which he is supposed to prove the sincerity of his profession, if it has been ascertained that he is a desirable match, he is invited to call.

His troubles are not ended yet, however, if viewed from the standpoint of an American courtship, for he is not permitted to sit alone with his sweetheart until a late hour in a dimly lighted parlor whispering tender nonsense into her ear. When he calls he is received in the brightly lighted sala (reception room) by as many members of the young lady's family as may find it convenient to be present, and in their presence and within their hearing his wooing must be conducted.



If everything goes well, an engagement is soon announced, but even then the young people are not permitted to swing on the front gate on starry evenings, discussing astronomy and the condition of the weather. They are never allowed to experience the delights of the moonlight drive alone; and the blissful privacy of the box at theatre or opera, remains equally a stranger, for should the young man rashly invite his sweetheart to accompany him to any place whatever, his invitation is understood to include her entire family.

When at last the long-expected day has arrived, and the good old Padre has pronounced his benediction upon them as husband and wife, the young people are allowed the blissful privilege of being alone, but not before that, even for a moment.

ELECTRICITY IS LIFE.

THE GREAT HOME HEALER.

Pain Vanishes, Blooming Health Returns at the Touch of Science.

Read of this Modern Scientific Machine that Heals, Teaches and Amuses.

Electricity no longer the master but the servant of man, represents to us light, heat and force. By these three great powers everything on earth lives and electricity means life. This grand machine is a combined motor and dynamo and gives a perfect electric organization. Most interesting and instructive of the recent products of electrical science; teaches and instructs while it amuses, young and old alike. Scientific in construction and no student or ingenious boy should be without it. Perfectly harmless, but produces no end of fun, by giving shocks to circles and many harmless tricks. FOR A HOME CURER. Doctors know almost every known disease and pain yields readily to electrical currents. The cost of electric batteries as generally sold places them far beyond reach of any but the wealthy. This Electrical Machine has been produced by the latest and most improved machinery and at nominal cost as compared with the expensive batteries formerly sold at $8, $10 or $20 each. The great improvements in machinery enables us to produce this and to offer it to you for a mere trifle. See What Electricity is Used For. There is no disease of the nerves or any bodily pain which will not yield readily to electric currents. This wonderful machine utilizes the forces of nature; drives out Rheumatic Pains, Neuralgia and every species of blood and nerve disease; Cures Weakness of every kind and nature and restores youthful health and vigor. Works like a miracle for that worn out feeling and languor and despondency and strengthening nervous system with a direct (not alternating) current, large in volume but pleasant to take, no shock or irritation. Patent switch adjusts current to weakest child or strongest man. A valuable treatise by Dr. Cutten accompanies every machine shipped. We now place nature's great restorative agent, Electricity, within the reach of every sufferer rich or poor.

A Wonderful Offer to All. This Electrical Machine is needed in every home and family. We will send one to any person who will send us $1.00, and 25 cents to pay all shipping charges besides sending our great home paper, COMFORT, subscription paid for one year. ($1.25 for everything.)

The month of the year that has few friends and many enemies is here. It takes a very genial optimistic sort of person to pass through the changes and chances of November weather without an adverse comment. A noted satirist once said: "What becomes of conversation if we may not mention the lady who has just left the room?" He seemed to forget the topic that is always with us—the weather. We may resolve not to be inane enough to start the conversational ball rolling with any such time worn farce as the weather. Alas, habit will conquer even the most brilliant and we pass the stereotyped remarks without thinking and with thinking. November has made a desperate effort to redeem its dreary skies and depressing atmosphere by furnishing two good round legal holidays to the poor mortals whose spirit it depresses. Election day and Thanksgiving. Even November skies have a silver lining, although the political party of the gold creed might hesitate to allow it.

Japan has long been noted for the exquisite art displayed in its textile fabrics, its pottery and its carvings. The imagination of the Japanese artist seems to surpass the greatest flights of other nations. Among the common people one can find traces of the delicacy of feeling and the sentiment that prompts the best work of their artist. A British naval officer died when his ship was in the Inland Sea of Japan. He was buried in the grounds of a Japanese temple. For thirty years after the natives cared for the tomb of the stranger. On a certain day of the month they clean and sweep the grave and offer up flowers and incense. A wooden cross had been set up by the ship's officers but this fell into decay. The simple but poetic natured folk of the village had it replaced by a monument of stone. They said: "Truly it would be too sad if the grave of our solitary guest from afar, who has become a spirit in a strange land were suffered to pass out of all knowledge." All this tender, delicate fancy is found among the poorest peasants. Surely our modern poet of labor would have no need of turning from the toilers of this land and exclaiming: "What gulfs between him and the seraphim!"

There is always something a little laughable in the annexation schemes of private individuals when they apply the schemes to national affairs. Away back in the Declaration of Independence days we made provision in that historic document for the expected coming of Canada to join the rebellious thirteen. Canada didn't come and she has no more purpose today of annexing herself to the "States" than she had in that far away time. Still we have people who seriously discuss the possible annexation of Canada. They will be interested in a brother annexationist in Portugal. He is on the staff of the Portuguese monarch and has published a pamphlet giving several reasons why Spain should become a dependency of Portugal. Poor Spain is indeed fallen when such an idea could be seriously held by any person. The Portuguese aid should read the history of the nation that once conquered and held Portugal. Then he should put beside that proud record the history of this our nation; he should even compare the two nations to-day on the lines of enlightenment and civilization. If he has the least judicial turn to his mind, he will save his ink and his imagination for saner flights after he has drawn the comparison.

The progress of affairs in the far east becomes of greater interest to us since our acquisition of the Philippines. It gives us a diplomatic interest in the talked of partition of China, in the rapid advance in civilization of Japan and in the conflict of the rival interest of Russia and England. We are interested now as a nation affected in its commercial interests by the possible men on the checkerboard of Oriental diplomacy. There is much talk of an alliance between China and Japan to prevent the encroachments of Russia. Many students of affairs believe that such a union would place China again in the ranks of powerful nations. It is thought that the Japanese would abolish the official corruption that has honeycombed the government of China. If the Japs were permitted to be the ruling spirits they would reorganize the Chinese army, navy and finances. The combined navy of China and Japan would offer a formidable obstacle to the Russian advance. The Chinese and Japanese for all the difference in national traits are of the same race. They are "brothers under their skin" and a union would undoubtedly save China from becoming the easy prey of European nations.

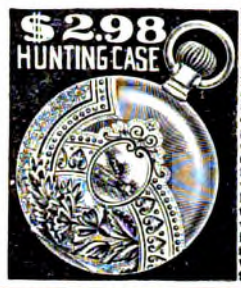
Every "once in a while" a ripple of excitement is caused by the declaration that woman has usurped some field of labor. Then again, a wave of excitement comes from the amusement that some field of labor is to be closed to women. A late report has it that the government will gradually rid itself of its women employes. It is claimed that they cannot adapt themselves to varieties of work so well as men and cannot respond as easily to sudden call for unusual exertion. A great telegraph line has been saying these same things for years and yet to-day it pays some of its highest salaries to its women employes. On the other hand it is claimed that the men in Chicago are taking positions as "maids" no, "men of all work." This position certainly furnishes a field for versatility of effort and permits its followers "variety of work." It may be that the very point where it is claimed women fail has caused them to abandon "maid of all work" places to men. All in all this discussion of sex in work may be pleasing but is hardly profitable. In spite of theories, in spite of prejudice, in spite of figures the work will eventually fall into the hands of the most able worker. The simple law of equivalents holds on the field of labor as in most other places.

The last two years has seen a perfect furore for the dramatization of novels. A large number of books that have been successful have been rewritten as plays. Mrs. Burnett's Lady of Quality was among the earlier of these plays. The Christian and The Little Minister held the boards all last winter and The Ghetto, The Gadfly and Becky Sharp have been produced this winter as well as a version of Dicken's Tale of Two Cities. We have long been familiar with the fact that many people acquire their knowledge of history easily through the medium of historical novels. Now we are concentrating still more and are making the attempt to acquire our knowledge of books through an evening at the play. This dramatization of novels can entirely please but one class of people—those who have not read the novels. The audiences are, however, largely made up of people who have read the books and who desire to see a creation of the mind made real. Each person in reading a book has a mental picture of the people who figure in the story. Their impression is firmly fixed before they see the play. One of two things must follow. They are either pleased or displeased at the production—a negative frame of mind is impossible. If the presentation accords with their own preconceived notions they feel satisfied—if it conflicts they cannot shake off the mental attitude they acquired when reading the production and they reject the interpretation. Our ideas of Shakespeare's heroines are clear cut and distinct because they have never spoken to us except through the lines of the play. It is very doubtful indeed whether art or artifice can justify the novel-play.

Thanksgiving Day, 1899, comes to the American people as a day that can in reality be a day of thanks. The material prosperity of the country is greater than it has been for years. On all sides we see the feeling of confidence in the financial outlook. We can feel that our great country occupies a prouder place on the roll of nations than has ever been accorded to her. The individual feeling of thankfulness is apt to be a matter of temperament. If we made it more a question of arithmetic, and established a debit and credit column of our earthly advantages we might find cause for thankfulness more often than we really do. Even the most distressing showing on the debit side leaves one long balance on the credit—the very fact of being alive. It is a good world that we live in—its joys and its sorrows are balanced in a fairly even manner. Thanksgiving Day is a purely American holiday. Its origin was in Puritan New England at the time when they were in greatest opposition to the Church of England and showed that opposition by refusing to observe Christmas Day. This being one of the great festival days of the Church the Puritans refused to make merry or to turn from their ordinary pursuits on that day. Thanksgiving Day was kept at first as a day of feasting and rejoicing—later it became a religious festival. We of later years have been rather prone to hark back to the earliest method of observing the day and have let the feasting and general good time draw us away from the old-time Thanksgiving sermon. Within a few years, however, the current of custom has set back again and the attendance at church has become a part of the regular program of the day.

THE ANCHOR ELECTRIC BELT.

AGENTS WANTED, BOTH SEX.



Goods sent to reliable persons to be paid for after selling. W. H. Palmer, Glasgo, Conn., has sold 1000 belts and as high as 20 in a day. With the Anchor Belt the power of the batteries is fully demonstrated; they will turn a needle through a plate, table or your hand, which is an Agent's Great but Silent Salesman. Wear the batteries and the electricity passes all through your system. No one but what can wear them. Cures Rheumatism, Liver and Kidney Disease, Weak and Lame Back, Nervousness, Weakness, Poor Blood, Chills, Nervous Prostration, Hysteria, Trembling, pains in the side and back, Apoplexy, St. Vitus' Dance, Palpitation, Nervous and Sick Headache, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Loss of Appetite, Neuralgia, Nervous Debility, Female Complaints, Piles, Constipation, Dyspepsia, Catarrh, Paralysis, Dumb Ague, Sleeplessness, Sciatica, Epileptic Fits, Numbness, Skin Disease, Prevents Cold Feet and taking cold, as you would not take cold if your blood was circulating properly as strongly as it should. Wearing the batteries on our belt gives a comfortable glow of warmth all over the body, which shows that it is acting on the circulation. All of these troubles and some others come from impure blood, which causes a sluggish circulation. Electricity gives the blood its proper circulation, and the Liver a Healthy action, makes it perform all its functions properly, which are to separate the pure from the impure, and throw all the impurities into the Bowels where they operate as Nature's Physic, giving healthy action, and preventing all constipation, while the blood passing on in circulation remains pure. For advertising purposes will give one belt free of any cost to one person in each locality. Address E. J. Smead & Co., Department No. 397, Vineland, New Jersey.

ROCK OF AGES.

There is not a reader of COMFORT that has not known that wonderful hymn "Rock of Ages" always and yet few have heard the story of its origin. Rev. Augustus Toplady, a young clergyman in the Established English church as long ago as the year 1775, was walking through what is known as Barrington Coombe, which is a deep indenture in a forbidding and dangerous hill known as the Black Down, when the fury of one of the severest storms ever known in that locality broke upon him. At one point a crag of rock over one hundred feet high conspicuously rears its head. Near the center of this is a fissure with an overhanging roof of stone under which he found protection, and here while the appalling storm raged without he wrote upon some stray leaves of paper nearly the entire hymn which for more than a century has brought hope and comfort to the weary and afflicted and has been the light of peace to the departing soul.

Space forbids us more than mentioning the great opportunity that every reader of COMFORT has to obtain the choicest sheet music of all kinds for practically the cost of mailing. Read the music offer in another part of the paper. If there is any dissatisfaction after you actually see it, we will return the money. Can anything be fairer? This is not cheap trash but real sheet music such as you buy at the music stores.

It is not always cheapness but excellence we seek in buying music. Monopoly prices are all right for the very rich in buying their sheet music; but the great mass of people are looking for a chance to get something back for their money. The greatest bargain ever offered to the American public in sheet music of best quality almost given away is found in COMFORT'S music offer in another column. It will more than pay you to read especially if you are paying from twenty-five to fifty cents a copy for exactly the same thing at book and music stores.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE art of flower making," writes Mrs. W. M. Knoer, from Huntland, Tenn., "is studied by very few people, simply because there is no way of learning except through schools where the art is taught, which is too expensive for those who must earn their living. But when once learned one is surprised to find how simple it is. With a pattern and instructions for any one kind of flower one can learn to make it in half an hour.

"As poppies are the simplest, I will give directions for their manufacture. Use bright red wash silk stiffened very little with gum arabic dissolved in water, and dried perfectly straight. Cut the leaves by the design given, which is full sized, of half a leaf for full open flower. Crimp around dotted edge by creasing in thumb and finger. For the center of flower roll one thread of moss green floss silk and two of black wool around the finger once, twist in a little loop a fine wire and fasten it to the wool and silk which should be twisted into a ball first. Around this gum fasten the poppy leaves five or six to each flower. The base of the flower can be made of soft bees' wax and dusted with green powder. The stems can be wound with green silk or paper, or prettier still, use rubber stems which cost but little; leaves can be cut of green silk and if you want them glossy dip the upper side very quickly in melted parafine. I would like to give more detailed directions of the above as well as of roses, lilacs, snowballs, hydrangeas, pansies, chrysanthemums, sunflowers, and others, if desired by any of the Bees, and will do so if they will send me stamped envelope for that purpose."

One of the new forms of entertainment is called a Mystery Tea. This is a very good name, for anything more mysterious as to the meanings of the names of eatables on the menu would be hard to find.

Each guest, when seated at table, was handed a card upon which the list of refreshments was written, but in a very peculiar and obscure manner, and the guest was to choose from this list what she would eat. For instance, some one ordered some "very pale ale" and "sour sustenance" and got some water and pickles. Another ordered "an oriental square" and "a little side dish," and got a Japanese napkin and salted almonds. Someone asked for "a gift of the gods" and "an after-dinner delicacy" and got coffee and toothpicks.

One can easily see how a clever hostess can make up a very amusing menu, with a little thought. Of course prizes can be given to those who choose the most appropriate things, for their lunch, from the cards. The menu given at the lunch in question was as follows—the names in parenthess of course not being on the card:

(Sandwiches)	A product of the desert.
(Coffee)	A gift of the gods.
(Cake)	Crushed cereal.
(Pickles)	Sour sustenance.
(Water)	Very pale ale.
(Candy)	Solidified Saccharine.
(Stuffed dates)	Toothsome tid-bits.
(Salted almonds)	A little sidedish.
(Tea)	For Russian revels.
(Japanese napkins.)	An Oriental square.
(Toothpicks)	An after-dinner delicacy.
(Ice cream)	An Arctic delight.

A BATHING CORSET.

Now for an entirely different subject. The corset here illustrated is for sea bathing, and is much more comfortable than to wear nothing of this kind and to feel the bands from the garments of the bathing suit cutting into the waist. This corset is made of ribbons and the front and back steels, and can easily be made at home; straps may go over the shoulders if desired, but this is not necessary. These corsets being made of one thickness of ribbon are quickly dried, and do not shrink as do those made of cotton. They may be made quite short, using for the front the shortest steel that is in the market. The idea is to keep the skirt band from cutting uncomfortably into the waist, as is so often the case, in order to keep it tight enough.

Many slim people wear this ribbon girdle all the time, instead of a heavier corset, and it is really very comfortable—but of course a stout person could not wear one; it is necessary to put bones in under the arms, of course, if to be worn under the ordinary gown, as the ribbon will wrinkle at that point if not stiffened.

One of the Bees from Brooklyn has suggested a "housewife" for traveling, which she described as follows:

Take a piece of blue denim 16 inches long and 7 inches wide; at the head, sew across the width a piece 3 inches deep and 7 long; then stitch down every 1 3-4 inch space, to hold spools (4 of them) under this fasten a needle book, each leaf to measure 3 by 5 inches. Underneath book, sew two strips of white tape 5 inches long, and fasten spaces to hold scissors; under this make a pocket 3 inches deep and 6 wide, with lap to fasten over with button, and embroider word "Buttons" in white on outside; bind the whole with white tape. Roll up in "Music Roll" style and fasten with button on outside and embroider your name.

A medicine case may be made same as housewife, with only pockets, into which fit the bottles; and a pocket for plaster.

CATARRH CAN BE CURED.

Catarrh is a kindred ailment of consumption, long considered incurable; and yet there is one remedy that will positively cure catarrh in any of its stages. For many years this remedy was used by the late Dr. Stevens, a widely noted authority on all diseases of the throat and lungs. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all sufferers from Catarrh, Asthma, Consumption and nervous diseases, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing, with stamp, naming this paper, W. A. Noyes, 920 Powers Block, Rochester, N. Y.

A GIFT OF EMBROIDERY SILK.

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

THIS is the month when the housewife, having relieved her mind of preserves and pickles and the fall cleaning, begins to plan for the Thanksgiving feast. This is no small matter, for it means the early preparation of the mince meat, and later the making of numberless mince pies—as they are in no wise injured from standing, and it is well to get everything made up as far ahead as possible.

In the cold parts of our country, where the winters are long and heat, except in the living rooms, is a scarce commodity, the housewife makes up her mince pies before Thanksgiving for the whole of the winter. These pies are then set out in the back pantry where they are left to be used as needed; frost in no wise injures them, and when one or more are wanted all that has to be done is to bring them into the warm kitchen three or four hours before they are to be eaten, and allow them to get warm gradually; then about half an hour before dinner they are put in the oven to get as warm as one likes. They should be eaten as hot as is comfortable to the mouth, to give forth all their delicious flavor. People who insist upon having their mince pie cold lose a great deal of the best of the pie, as the suet is in cold hard chunks and so the filling lacks the richness that it has when hot and the suet is melted.

Those housewives who are new to the business and like to try new recipes instead of using "Mother's," may perhaps like to try the following one for mincemeat:

Chop fine four pounds, uncooked beef from the round, and two pounds of kidney suet, separately; add twice as much chopped apple as meat, one pound sugar, three cups molasses, two quarts boiled cider, three pounds seedless raisins, the same of currants, half a pound of sliced citron, the juice of three lemons, one tablespoon each of ground cinnamon and mace, one grated nutmeg, one teaspoon ground cloves and two tablespoons of salt. Mix thoroughly and set aside over night. Fill the crust without previously cooking the mince. Pies should be baked about an hour. Scald the remainder of the mince and put away in preserve jars. In adding the second quart of boiled cider, take care that the mixture is not too thin. It may not need the whole of the second quart.

Nothing can be better than the old-fashioned New England Thanksgiving dinner, where turkey was the king of the feast, and the edge of the appetite was not taken off by a soup and fish course. However, for people who prefer a course dinner, the following recipe may be acceptable in making the plans ahead.

Oysters on half shell. Lemon. Horse radish.
Clam Bouillion. Pickles. Celery.
Roast turkey. Giblet gravy. Cranberry sauce.
Baked squash. Mashed potatoes. Chicken croquettes.
Water Cress Salad. French Dressing.
Hot Mince and Apple Pie. Squash Pie.
Club House Cheese. Fruit Pudding.
Nuts and Raisins. Fruit. Black Coffee.

If clam bouillon is used and cream is a home product, add a cup of same, with additional seasonings, to the hot bouillon, just before serving. It gives a delicious flavor.

CHICKEN CROQUETTES.

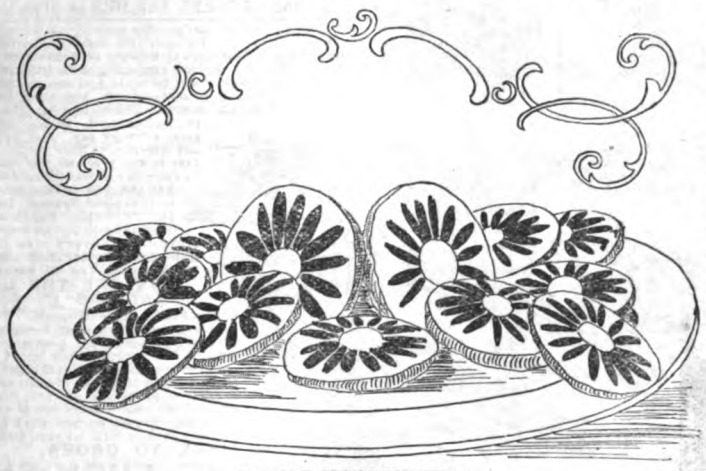
Melt one-fourth cup butter, add half cup flour and let cook until frothy; add gradually, stirring constantly, one cup chicken stock and half a cup of thin cream. Season with salt, pepper and celery salt; then add one egg well beaten, and one pint chopped chicken. Let stand until very cold and then shape; roll in fine bread crumbs, cover with a beaten egg diluted with two tablespoonfuls cold water and then roll a second time in the bread crumbs. Fry in deep fat, drain on soft paper, and serve while hot.

The following Thanksgiving menu, for a family of three, may be gotten up for two dollars:

Consomme. Pickles.
Roast Chicken. Celery.
Cress Salad. Cranberry Sauce.
Baked Squash. Mashed Potato.
Pumpkin Pie. Cheese. Fruit.
Nuts. Coffee.

Where people object to eating left-overs,—and there always are some in so small a family—the idea of having a roast stuffed chicken instead of a turkey is a good one, and one chicken is all that is necessary where there are as many items on the menu as given above. How nice it is to finish up the repast in one day and not feel that there are left-overs that must be eaten the two or three days following the great feast.

We illustrate herewith some of the new Sponge Marguerites, served recently at a luncheon. The recipe says to cut a thin sheet of sponge cake into rounds, by means of a small cookie cutter; spread each round with frosting made of confectioner's sugar, a few drops of vanilla, and hot water to make of the consistency to spread. Then use almonds that have been browned in the oven, for the petals, and put a drop of the frosting in the center.



A new filling for layer cake is made as follows: Boil a cup of sugar and one-third cup of water without stirring, until the syrup threads. Pour in a fine stream onto the white of an egg which has been beaten until foamy but not stiff; add one-fourth pound figs finely chopped and cooked in one-fourth cup water; then add half a cup of walnut meats finely chopped. Beat until cold enough to spread.

RAISIN FILLING.

Cook together slowly one cup seeded and chopped raisins, one cup water and two-thirds cup sugar. When raisins are tender, add one egg beaten slightly, and stir and cook over hot water until slightly thickened. Flavor with lemon, and let the mixture cool before using.

FIG FILLING.

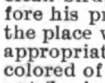
Half a pound of finely chopped figs, one cup water and one-half cup sugar; cook until smooth, stirring constantly. A tablespoonful of lemon juice or half a cup of chopped nuts may be added, if desired.

SPONGE MARGUERITES.

A SIMPLE EXPLANATION.

SCIENTISTS are often unable to find the cause of natural phenomena, but not so with the simple savage, whose fertile imagination supplies him with an explanation of everything. Take, for instance, the plumage of birds; science has never been able to explain why the peacock and parrot should invariably be clothed in gaudy raiment, and the raven as invariably in somber black. But the Zuni Indians know, and no scientists could do worse than to accept the explanation that lies in the following Zuni legend:

"In the beginning, the fowls of the air were naked like men, having only a few scattered hairs on their bodies for covering; and being ashamed of their nakedness, for a long time they remained hidden. But by and by they assembled in a great medicine council, and prayed Cinauhuav (the wolf-god) to give them clothing. In response it was revealed to them that their coverings were ready, but were a long way off, and that they must either go or send for them.



"Accordingly another council was held, this time to select some bird to go after the plumage, but each found an excuse for not going. Finally At-chi-ala-topa, the turkey-buzzard, volunteered to go; and it being a long journey to the place, he, who before that had been a clean bird, was compelled to eat carrion, therefore his present nature. When he arrived at the place where the coverings were, he at once appropriated to himself the most beautifully colored of them all; but he found that he could not fly in it, so he continued trying on suit after suit until he arrived at the least beautiful one, which fitted him perfectly, and in which he rides so gracefully through the air. He then returned to his companions bearing the feathery garments, and each bird chose the suit that fitted him best."

In confirmation of this story, the Zunis point to the hair-like feathers found on the bodies of all birds.

It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister or daughter looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed even against his will and without his knowledge or co-operation. Send your name and address to Dr. J. W. Haines, 879 Glenn Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, and he will mail enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee or food and that it will cure the dreaded habit quietly and permanently, also full directions how to use it, books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to aid you in saving those near and dear to you from a life of degradation and ultimate poverty and disgrace.

The above is a picture of Miss Mary Roberts, 1033 Golden Gate Ave., San Francisco, Cal., who successfully cured her brother after he had led a drunkard's life for years. She most heartily recommends Golden Specific to every woman and wants to do everything in her power to help others save the drunkard.

Dollars for Pennies.

"THE LIGHT THAT WON'T GO OUT."

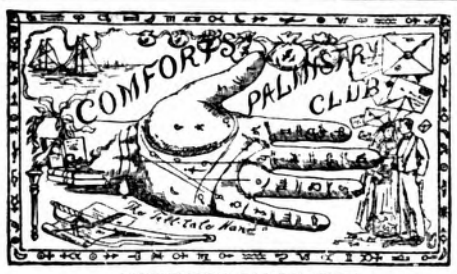
Every family in America is ready to buy "The light that sells on sight"—the wonderful new invention called ARC-LIGHT WICK.

It burns a whole year without trimming. It kills a candle, discounts kerosene, beats gas, and almost equals electricity or sunlight.

It saves 20 per cent. of oil. It's clear, white and brilliant. It's the light that won't go out. It's the light in the window for thee.

The Light That Sells On Sight.

The ARC-LIGHT is something new. All need it, all buy it, all bless it. To show it means to sell it, and it yields from 100 per cent. to 300 per cent. profit to agents.



The same kind of carbon that gives the electric light its brilliancy is woven into the Arc-Light by a patent process. We hold affidavit showing that an Arc-Light burned 1040 hours, giving the last hour the same perfect, brilliant, light it gave the first.

A single lamp manufacturer in New England, who bought over 35,000 writes: "The Arc-Light beats all others. It sells our lamps, and turns night into day." Every home, store, hotel, saloon, hall, church, or car company will buy the Arc-Light Wick on sight. We have made arrangements with the manufacturers to introduce this wonderful discovery, and we offer for 60 days the following wholesale terms to agents:

Medium or A wick, 5-8 inch wide—the size for house lamps—by mail, sample 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $2.50. Large or B wicks, for table, bracket lamps, 1 inch wide, wicks, for hand lamps, sample, 5 per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $2.50. Extra wide, sample, 5 cents; inches wide, for incubators, hall, store, or sample, 5 cents; store lamps, sample, 8 cents; $3.50. Dwick, 1 1-2 $3.50 per gross. Argand wicks for hall, bracket, or 33 cents dozen; parlor lamps, same, 33 cents; per gross, $3.50. On all orders for $10.00 accompanied by the cash, 15 per cent. off. Send cor sample dozen, giving width desired, and see how they go. We can supply you with any style ARC-LIGHT WICK in any quantities, from a single wick to a thousand dozen.

Copyright, 1896, by Morse & Co.

SPECIAL FREE COUPON OFFER. To all who send six cents and this offer for three months' trial subscription to this paper we will send 2 samples of A B or E wick. Address COMFORT, Box 959, Augusta, Maine.

CONDUCTED BY DIGITUS.

CONDITIONS.

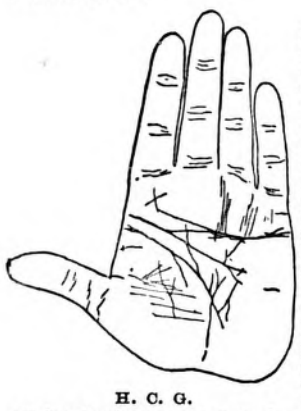
To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living palmists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:

Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to COMFORT PALMISTRY CLUB, Augusta, Maine.

No notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unle s the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheet of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carefully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixatif, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an atomizer. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

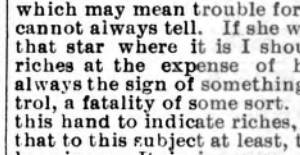


Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-greased, palm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Several minutes will be required to get this impression and great care must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putty is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixatif.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

Also, that letters not complying with them will go into the waste-basket. Readings cannot appear for several months after impresions are sent.

THERE are several hands to be read this month and I will not attempt to answer questions in this number; but I will say to "Anxiety" that her hands were read in the September COMFORT under the first nom de plume she sent, "Despondent."



The same sister wants to have a star defined exactly so that any reader may know it. The star may be a perfect one, formed by the crossing of three lines so as to make six points or ends, or it may be formed of three or four irregular lines crossing each other at the same place; or it may be formed by the junction of two lines with one of the main lines. There is no way of picturing it that would be an infallible guide.

H. C. G.

"H. C. G." are the initials of a brother who has sent his impressions several times, but who gives no nom de plume. He writes on paper bearing the heading of a coal company in one of the middle southern states. Does he recognize it? He has the hand of a successful business man. He has excellent judgment and the courage of his convictions. When he thinks a thing is right or best to do, he goes ahead and does it, regardless of the opinions of other people and generally turns out to be right. He is an ambitious man and will gain the objects of his ambition and will occupy a high position in his community or state and be greatly respected. He will be successful in a business way and will have plenty of money in his old age. He will be very much wrapped up in his business or in his public work during the middle of his career, say from thirty to fifty. He has only one serious love affair in life, although he will be a favorite and much admired by women. The one affair to which I refer comes at an early age, say between eighteen and twenty-five, but it will be broken off in some way, much to his sorrow. I think the girl will gradually grow away from him but he will never care so much for any other. He has a clear, cool head and logical mind. He will succeed in business, either as a lawyer, or as a politician, and as I said before will amass wealth before he is fifty, with fame thrown in. He will be honest and upright even in small matters and will make a true friend to those who are fortunate enough to gain his friendship. On the whole, a fortunate and promising hand.

"Aunt Jane" has a pretty good hand also, though of a very different type. She has good judgment with a taste for the artistic and romantic. She loves novels and poetry, especially of a sentimental kind. With all this she has good sense and an upright mind which makes her highly respected and will be in her favor as long as she lives. She, too, has her own convictions and is not afraid to stand up for them. She will go ahead and carry out any work which she thinks is good and proper, and not sit and dream impossible things or plan great things for other people to perform. She is courageous and much beloved by her own family and her friends. In matters of the heart she will be steadfast and true to the man she marries. She can always be trusted and she has some pet ambition which she does not always feel willing to talk about to every one. She will live to about sixty but will not have very good health after she is fifty. She will marry not far from twenty-five and will have only one child that will live to grow up, and he will cause her a great deal of anxiety. She is by nature very nervous, but has learned to control herself in that respect. She will travel somewhat during the latter part of her life, and will have lucky journeys. Her fate-line is better than the average, indicating good luck and the gradual increase of wealth. In her last years she will be more than comfortably well off. She will always be much liked by every one, and if she has any foes will be triumphant over them. She has a talent for teaching and, if she will carefully develop it, a talent for writing; although I fear she will have to develop her bump of patience first. This too, is a fortunate hand; far better than the average.

AUNT JANE.

"Helig L." has a good hand indicating long life and good degree of success in what he undertakes, but he will have to work for it. In his early life he has not had the freedom that he should have had. He has either had to work for his living too early, or his parents have kept him in too close. He will not get over the influence of that until he is twenty-five or thereabouts, but after that he will go on and be quite lucky in everything. He will live to be eighty or perhaps ninety and there is very little trouble in his palm after he is twenty-five. He is a good friend and a steady reliable fellow who will make a good citizen of his town and state. I do not think he will hold high offices or has any taste for that sort of thing. He has a great deal of tact and knows how to get along with people very well. He too, has some affair of the heart when quite young but he gets over it and will marry happily and rather young. He meets with some discouragement at the beginning of his career in life or when he starts out for himself, but he will come out from that and go right on through life without many obstacles in future. He will make a successful farmer or a good doctor. He is fond of reading, takes an interest in all public affairs and is a good patriot, and is steady and affectionate, a good husband and father. I would like to see more such citizens of our country as he.

HELIG L.

"Miss May" has a strictly feminine hand, indicating gentleness and refinement but great nervousness. She is fond of music and pictures and is a good singer or player, or at least might be if she chose. She is fond of admiration, especially from the opposite sex and has a great deal of it. She will be engaged twice but will meet with opposition from her family in these matters which will cause her some disappointment and a great deal of anxiety for a time, but she will finally marry happily and settle down to enjoy life. She should endeavor not to show her feelings too plainly when she likes a young man, as that is her tendency and there is danger that the young man will become tired of her. Her health was delicate in childhood and is not very strong up to her twenty-fifth year, but after that it will improve and she will live to be very, very old. There is a tremendous star near the centre of her hand, which may mean trouble for her, although one cannot always tell. If she were a man and had that star where it is I should say it meant riches at the expense of health. A star is always the sign of something beyond our control, a fatality of some sort. There is much in this hand to indicate riches, but I should say that to this subject at least, they will not bring happiness. It is in some respects a curious hand and if she is ever in the vicinity of Cheiro I should advise her having him read her palms, as there are some characteristics that can be detected in the warm, living hand that do not appear in a plaster cast or in the smoked paper impression.

MISS MAY.

I am in receipt of more letters asking for the terms of readings, how to take and send impressions etc. These things may all be found in the heading to these articles. Mind you observe all the conditions.

Clothing Salesmen Wanted.

$150.00 PER MONTH AND EXPENSES MADE BY ALL OUR ACTIVE MEN. WE PAY MANY FAR MORE.

WE WANT MEN IN EVERY COUNTY

in the United States. If your reference is satisfactory we will start you at once. No experience necessary. No capital required. We furnish a full line of samples, stationery, etc. A tailor's-for-the-trade complete outfit ready for business. NO COMMISSION PLAN. You regulate your profits to suit yourself. No house-to-house canvass. This is not one of the many catchy advertisements for agents, but one of the very few advertisements offering a rare opportunity to secure strictly high-grade employment at BIG WAGES.

We are the LARGEST TAILORS in America. We make to measure over 300,000 suits annually. We occupy entire one of the largest business blocks in Chicago. We refer you to the Corn Exchange National Bank in Chicago, any Express or Railroad Co. in Chicago, any resident of Chicago. Before engaging with us, write to any friend in Chicago and ask them to come and see us, then write you if it is a rare opportunity to secure steady, high-class, big-paying employment. BETTER STILL—come to Chicago yourself and see us before engaging and satisfy yourself regarding every word we say. You can get steady work and big pay. Work in your own county 300 days in the year and you can't make less than $5 every day above all expenses. WE WANT TO ENGAGE YOU to take orders for our Made-to-Order-and-Measure Custom Tailoring, (Men's Suits, Pants and Overcoats). We put you in the way to take orders from almost every man in your county; a business better than a store with a $20,000.00 stock. You will have no competition.

WE ARE THE LARGEST TAILORS IN AMERICA

Of Fine Custom-Made Garments. We buy our cloth direct from the largest European and American Mills. We control the product of several Woolen Mills. We operate the most extensive and economic custom tailoring plant in existence, thus reducing the price of Suits and Overcoats made to order to $5.00 and upward; Pants from $1.50 to $5.00. We show a large line of suits at from $5.00 to $8.00. Prices so low that nearly everyone in your county will be glad to have their suits

MADE TO ORDER.

WE FURNISH YOU

a large, handsome leather-bound book, containing large cloth samples of our entire line of Suitings, Pantaloonings, etc., a book which COSTS US SEVERAL DOLLARS; also Fine Colored Fashion Plates, Instruction book, Tape Measure, Business Cards, Stationery, Advertising Matter, and your name and address on rubber stamp with pad complete. We also furnish you a Salesman's Net Confidential Price List. The prices are left blank under each description so you can fill in your own selling prices, arranging your profit to suit yourself. As soon as you receive your sample book and general outfit and have read our book of instructions carefully, which teaches you how to take orders, and marked in your selling price, you are ready for business and can begin taking orders from every one. At your low prices, business men, farmers and in fact every one will order their suits made. You can take several orders every day at $1.00 to $5.00 profit on every order. EVERY ONE WILL BE ASTONISHED AT YOUR LOW PRICES.

YOU REQUIRE NO MONEY. Just take the orders and send them to us, and we will make the garments within 5 days and send direct to your customers by express C. O. D., subject to examination and approval, at your selling price, and collect your full selling price, and every week we will send you a check for all your profit. You need collect no money, deliver no goods, simply go on taking orders, adding a liberal profit and we deliver the goods, collect all the money and every week promptly send you in one round check for your full profit for the week. NEARLY ALL OUR GOOD MEN GET A CHECK from us of AT LEAST $40.00 every week in the year.

THE OUTFIT IS FREE. We make no charge for the book and complete outfit, but as each outfit costs US SEVERAL DOLLARS, to protect ourselves against many who would impose on us by sending for the outfit with no intention of working, but merely out of idle curiosity, as a GUARANTEE OF GOOD FAITH on the part of EVERY APPLICANT, we require you to fill out the blank lines below, giving the names of two parties as reference, and further agreeing to pay, merely as a temporary deposit, ONE DOLLAR and express charges for the outfit, when received, if found as represented and really a sure way of making big wages. The $1.00 you agree to pay when outfit is received does not begin to pay the cost to us, but insures us you mean business. WE WILL REFUND YOUR $1.00 as soon as your orders have amounted to $25.00, Which amount you can take the first day you work.

Fill out the following lines carefully, sign your name, cut out and send to us, and the outfit will be sent you at once.

AMERICAN WOOLEN MILLS CO., West Side Enterprise Bldg., CHICAGO, ILL.

GENTLEMEN:—Please send me by express, C. O. D., subject to examination, your Sample Book and Complete Salesman's Outfit, as described above. PNEUMATIC RAPID-FIRE RIFLE.

Here's One on the Pneumatic Plan for Just One Dollar, Made Entirely of Wood and Metal.

Stained and polished to represent mahogany, has all improvements, exposed metal parts, heavily plated. Same size as regular Carbine. Is designed for shot, which can be bought for a trifling expense anywhere. Works on the pneumatic spring scientific plan. Loads at Breech. Shoots with accuracy. Has the force and precision of any magazine gun. Can be used with perfect safety by men, women and children. No horrible accidents by careless handling. Kills birds and small game. Just right for hunting where silence is wanted. Brass tubes, air chamber, and heavy metal springs. Endorsed by officers of the Army and Navy as the best mechanical rifle ever produced. Used on practice ships in place of regular magazine rifles. Boys are delighted with it and prefer it to a larger gun. Can be kept in your room to protect the household if you dislike to have firearms around. Absolutely no danger. Perfect workmanship guaranteed in each gun. We will send this paper a year and this rifle complete and sent carefully packed for $1.00.

SPECIAL OFFER. Send us a club of five yearly subscribers to this paper at 25 cents each, and we will send you one of these rifles free as a premium, all charges paid. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

The Earl and Countess Aberdeen.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

The visit of the Earl of Aberdeen to Princeton, N. J., to receive the degree of LLD. from the University there, and the notable trend of the address there on that occasion, making for peace between America and Great Britain, attracted universal attention at the time to the then Governor General of Canada. Lord Aberdeen was accompanied by his wife, who is so fully his equal in executive ability and in her active participation in public and philanthropic work that she shares general interest with him.

Both on their way to Princeton and returning, the Aberdeens stopped in Boston. In connection with work on one of the Boston daily papers I had occasion to see them several times, and I think that certain of their characteristics which greatly interested me, and which may properly enough be written of, may be of interest to others.

With all our closely hugged American independence it has often been said that we dearly love a lord. Be that true or not, a newspaper man's experience inclines me to have no doubt but what we dearly love to know how a lord looks and acts, and what he says.

A reporter's pencil is apt to be at the same time a measuring rule. When, after many interviews with little people who would make themselves big, he meets a man and woman like Canada's Ex-Governor General and his wife who are as eminent for ability and character as they are high in rank, and who are at the same time apparently as forgetful of their own position as they are free from any attempt to impose observance of it upon others, he marks that in his note book as "a bright day."

Partly because it was an unwritten law that on account of his official position the Governor General of Canada is not expected to be interviewed, and partly because I had received an intimation that Lady Aberdeen had a special interest in this visit to Boston, I sent my card, on going to their hotel, to her Ladyship. Word was brought back to me at once by the bell boy that Lady Aberdeen was engaged, and would I kindly wait.

The freshly written page of the hotel register bore the names of

The Earl of Aberdeen
Countess Aberdeen
Lady Marjorie Gordon.

I had been waiting not more than ten minutes—pseudo nobility oftener kept me waiting an hour—when I saw an exceeding beautiful young girl walk down the stairs and up to the clerk's desk. In reply to her question the clerk nodded over into the corner where I was sitting, and she crossed to me.

Was this Mr.——? Lady Aberdeen was now disengaged, and would I kindly come up to the rooms? The messenger proved to be Lady Marjorie Gordon herself, whose mother, Lady Aberdeen, had sent her down to do the errand, in lieu of ringing for a bell boy.

Lady Marjorie, by the way, an interesting commentary on English and American methods of bringing up girls—was at seventeen still in dresses which if they were not short were decidedly not long, and at the various functions at which I saw her afterwards was very distinctly seen and not heard. One member of the party was an Englishwoman who, in the idiom of their land, "reads with Lady Marjorie."

Lady Aberdeen met me, as she did two other newspapermen who came in soon after, with a cordial English grasp of the hand, and when we rose to leave the room bade us god speed in the same hearty fashion.

The special errand of the Aberdeens in Boston was to interest the Canadian-born residents in that city in the scheme just then being inaugurated in Canada to establish a Victorian Order of Nurses in commemoration of the Queen's Jubilee. Lady Aberdeen, on the Sunday of their return, spoke in Tremont Temple to an audience of three thousand people, to interest them in the plan. Her Ladyship was evidently not a practiced public speaker, but she had a simple earnestness which made the words spoken by her sweet, strong voice full of force.

I think no better keynote can be had to Lady Aberdeen's character than her closing words: "I have appealed to you, dear friends," she said, "in the name of the country of your birth and the sacred ties of your childhood, and in the name of our Queen, but I venture to close with a higher appeal still. What has been the lesson of the Queen's life? What has given her her influence? Is it not that we remember when she was told that she had become Queen her first act was to ask for the help of God? Hence I venture to close my appeal with the words of our Master, himself,—'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.'"

Equally characteristic was what Lord Aberdeen said later. For him, knowing that in his official position at that time his words must have a double importance, it was no light matter to say as Lord Aberdeen did:—"Not only will this help be cherished by my wife and myself, but it will remain an emblem of that force which exists on both sides the Atlantic as a fixed determination that we shall show not only in doctrine but in action that we shall be the followers of the Prince of Peace."

One instance of Lord Aberdeen's kindly thoughtfulness come to my attention later. Among the hardest-working people of Boston is a young woman who is a native of Halifax, and who in years back, before reverses had scattered its members to hard work, had been one of a family which had been prominent in that city, and in the province. The Aberdeens had come recently from Halifax, the Governor General having been making an official tour of the maritime provinces. Late in the afternoon of the Aberdeens' last day in Boston a quiet reception was given them at the home of one of the most distinguished women in Boston, in order that a few people might meet them. The young woman of whom I have spoken and I had started to come away. We had said good-by to Lady Aberdeen some little time before, and then, as both the Earl and Countess were in the center of the drawing-room surrounded by those who were anxious to speak with them, we told each other we would slip out quietly, without further ceremony.

In the hall an acquaintance detained my companion a moment, and as we stood there, she with her wrap and I hat in hand, the Earl happened to turn and see us. At once he withdrew from the circle of people around him, and coming out extended his hand as he said: "Were you really going without saying good-by?" Then the Earl of Aberdeen and Governor General of Canada, squeezed into a corner of the hall, spent the next ten minutes in an interested talk about Halifax and the Haligonians with this young woman, whose proudest boast it is that she earns her daily bread by hard work.

Another Reader Has Been Making Money.

In a recent issue of your valuable paper I read of the success of one of your readers making so much money selling Sugarine that I wish to give my experience. I have not made less than $10 a day for the last few weeks. I have tried this Sugarine in all kinds of cooking and I have found it splendid. I sent for samples and directions to start with and I found the work so pleasant and easy that I am going to sell it right along. This Sugarine is 450 times as sweet as sugar. It only requires one drop to sweeten a cup of tea, coffee, milk, &c. Used for pastry, canned fruit and anything that sugar is used for. I make my own Sugarine. Write to W. H. Baird & Co., Dept. 500, Station A, Pittsburg, and they will send you full particulars free, or they will send you a sample by mail with complete directions for making it for 18 two cent stamps. You should sell from one to six boxes at most every place you call. With the proceeds of my work I am building a nice home. Try it and report your success in next issue. A READER.

X RAY WONDER TUBE, 10c

The Wonder Tube is a wonderful toy which affords and creates astonishment among young and old. It shows the bones of the hand, the lead in a pencil, the hole through a pipe stem, etc. etc. It is a baffler to all, and we defy any one to give any explanation of it without taking the instrument apart, and this will disclose something beyond the power of man to reproduce. In using the Wonder Tube place it to the eye as shown in cut and look toward a window or other strong light (daylight is better than artificial light); then hold the fingers in front of the instrument, spread them apart, moving them backward and forward until the proper focus is obtained, when you will have the identical appearance shown by the Roentgen Rays.

Price post paid 10c Each; 3 for 25c; Doz., only 60c.

TURKEYS FOR THANKSGIVING.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THANKSGIVING day in New England without turkey would be like the play of Hamlet with the ghost left out. All New England farmers are aware of this, and all feel it to be a part of their yearly duties to raise and fatten the luscious bird in preparation for this great day of feasting; but most of them take to the business of turkey raising as a mere adjunct to their principal occupation. Here and there, however, is one who makes his bit of ground into a turkey farm and the immense piles of defunct and plucked turkeys in the markets of the adjacent cities at Thanksgiving time testify to his success in his chosen work. Simply to observe the "modus operandi" in a turkey raiser's life I visited such a farm recently, and for the benefit of the readers of COMFORT I will write down my observations there.

We left Providence, R. I., by steam cars, and jogged along leisurely, stopping at every tiny village on the way until we reached Warwick. Here we alighted, and found waiting for us a veritable ark of a covered wagon driven by a grizzly, gray, weather-beaten old man, whose deep-set blue eyes twinkled at us merrily from an unshaven face as he bade us a cheerful "good-day," and threw back the old brown buffalo robe as an invitation for us to sit beside him in the wagon. For two or three miles we rode along the country road, in the chill November air, catching a glimpse, occasionally, of a red or gray squirrel scampering over the stone wall which bordered the road, and now and then hearing the sharp "tap-tap-tap" of a woodpecker. At last we came in sight, simultaneously, of glints of the blue ocean in the distance, and, near by, of a large enclosure, embracing meadow, pasture, and woodland, and filled with hundreds of turkeys, of all colors and sizes—white and buff turkeys, long, slim and gray ones, stately bronze colored birds, jet black and shining silvery ones. They were all peacefully pursuing their usual turkish avocations, but the moment we alighted from the wagon and entered the wooden gate in the wall that surrounded them they flocked towards us from all quarters, crowding around their owner and eagerly watching for indications of corn.

The finest of all turkeys for eating purposes is the cross between the bronze and the wild turkey. They bring the highest prices, and the supply is seldom equal to the demand.

The most critical time of the year to turkey farmers is the breeding season. Turkeys are naturally rovers, and in nesting time are apt to steal away out of bounds if not carefully watched, and then the young brood is generally a total loss to the owner of the parent birds. Sometimes the farmer succeeds in "fooling" them by making them nests in secluded places within the inclosures where the mother "hen" sits placidly on her eggs, secure in the belief that she is out of the reach of the vandal man. After the young are hatched she discovers her mistake, but she cannot get her babies over the wall, so she yields to the inevitable and remains with them.

Within the enclosure grass and weeds are kept carefully cropped for young turkeys until they are two months old; they are very tender and delicate, and should they get their feathers thoroughly wet by running in tall grass they would almost certainly die. Constant care is therefore necessary to see that all the young broods are under cover upon the approach of rain or a sudden shower.

As Thanksgiving approaches the turkey farmer's anxieties and cares increase. The weather is carefully watched that no sudden chill may come to his fattening birds. As the cold increases so do the appetites of the turkeys, and the farmer's stock of corn sensibly diminishes, but with the decrease in the contents of the corncribs comes a rapidly gaining weight for the turkeys. As long as he can guard against a sudden chill the farmer welcomes and rejoices in "zero" weather, for the cold, sharp air inclines the birds to huddle together for warmth, so the fat acquired by indulgence in corn is not worn off by exercise.

Finally, for about three weeks before the great day, the doomed birds are fed upon what is to them a great luxury—chestnuts. These soaked and cracked open, are given them once each day for their noon meal. The turkeys are now in prime condition, and the closing act in their lives—the slaughter scene—is holiday play to the man who has anxiously watched and cared for them during the six or eight months of their existence.

A NOVEL TICKET PUNCH.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

IN all thinly inhabited countries, every man is largely a law unto himself. This was particularly so in the early days of railroad construction in Northern Mexico, for that country was then a haven of refuge for a swarm of desperadoes who openly set at defiance what little law there was. The following anecdote is illustrative of conditions then prevailing there:

A conductor was going through his train collecting fares, when he came to a rough looking man, an American, who was sitting with his back to the forward door of the car in which he was riding.

"Ticket, please," the conductor said politely; but the passenger seemed not to hear him.

"Ticket, please," he repeated, speaking louder, but the man still remained in apparent ignorance of his presence.

"Ticket, please," he said again, gently shaking the man by the shoulder.

"This is my ticket!" the passenger snarled savagely, with a quick motion pointing the muzzle of a cocked revolver at the conductor.

"That's good, sir! that's good!" returned the quick witted conductor. "Tickets, please," he went on, turning to the other passengers, and passing on toward the rear end of the car. When he had finished his collection, he turned, and going unconcernedly past the desperado, went out of the car by the forward door.

In a few minutes the door opened again, and the next moment the desperado felt something rubbing his head just back of his ear; he hastily turned his head around, and found himself gazing into the muzzle of a cocked rifle that was held in the conductor's hands.

Leaning slightly toward the desperado, the conductor said, courteously: "Will you kindly let me punch that ticket of yours?"

SWANSON'S "5 DROPS" is the sun of the sick room. It has saved the public, in less than five years, more money than the national debt of this country, when you measure the value of health restored, suffering humanity relieved of its agonies and diseases. Money which otherwise would have been expended in funerals, doctors and drug bills, loss of labor, etc., and relieved suffering humanity of at least 10,000,000 years of excruciating pain and agony. This is more than can be said of any or all other remedies or electrical appliances of any kind. If you have never used it, do not fail to send for at least a trial bottle.

SWANSON'S "5 DROPS" never fails to cure. It has cured and is curing millions of people afflicted with ACUTE and CHRONIC RHEUMATISM, SCIATICA, NEURALGIA, ASTHMA, LA GRIPPE and CATARRH of all kinds. The Magical Sponge differs from the ordinary sponge in nature, while the common sponge is of vegetable origin and found in the ocean, the Magical Sponge is a mineral production and found in the United States, dug from the ground, carefully prepared and manufactured into sponges for the Housekeeper, Merchant, Liveryman, Metal Workers, and all persons who desire to keep their homes, offices, and business places in a clean and healthy condition.

No Soap or water is needed or even used with the Magical Sponge for Cleaning Windows or any outside Metal. In the winter time it has no equal, it does not freeze, and no water being used (other than what is in the sponge) all trouble and hard work is avoided. For Cleaning Baseboards, Window Sills, Wainscoating and painted surfaces, it acts like a charm; takes all the finger marks, spots, grease and dirt away, leaving a Clean, Polished Surface.

The Ancient Game of Football.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE great Duke of Wellington was once asked to what he attributed the nerve and courage displayed on the field of Waterloo by the British soldiers. To the surprise of all he answered, "To football." There may have been a great deal of truth in the answer for the game of football is calculated to give the players nerve, courage and endurance.

Though cricket may be called the national game of England, yet it is undoubtedly true that football is the most popular. Last season the game played between Notts and Derby County drew a crowd of 50,000 people while the game between Everton and Aston Villa, for the trophy, the English cup, a year before, was witnessed by over 70,000 persons.

Football has been played in England since the time of Cæsar, his victorious soldiers introducing it to the admiring natives. The game was known to the Greeks more than three thousand years ago and though the historians do not tell us the rules under which it was then played there is every reason to believe that it differed but slightly from the modern game.

For hundreds of years the Malays have indulged in a game resembling football, and as far back as the history of Scandinavia goes we find evidences of a similar game played in Norway, Sweden, Iceland and among the people still farther north.

The earliest description of the English game is given by William Fitzstephen, in his history of London, written in the twelfth century. The apprentices played against each other, and the various guilds offered prizes to be competed for on the football field.

In the middle ages the game was recognized as a national pastime, and all classes played it. In the fourteenth century the game was made a medium for hate, revenge and murder by some of the rougher elements. To openly injure another was dangerous for punishment was summary, but to engage in a game of football and under cover of it kill an enemy, was a safe way of having revenge for real or fancied injury.

These brutish practices, however, were not characteristic of the game but were only indulged in by the lawless. Barclay, in the "Ship of Fools," written in 1509, tells us that:

"The sturdie plowman, lustie, strong and bold,
Overcometh the winter with driving the footeball,
Forgetting labour and many a grievous fall."

History is silent on the subject of the ball itself, and it is hard to discover what kind of balls were used. That the leather case was used in early times is proved by Shakespeare who causes Dromio of Ephesus, in the "Comedy of Errors," to say:

"Am I so round—
That like a football thou dost spurn me thus?
You spurn me hence, and he will spurn me hither;
If I last in this service, you must case me in leather."
(act II, s 1.)

The game was played on all holidays, but the favorite day of all others was Shrove Tuesday. Sometimes the feeling would become so bitter that all through Lent the players would be wishing for Easter Monday when they could again play, this time not for sport but vengeance.

In the reign of James I, the game became so rough that the king issued a proclamation against rough sport, "as football, meeter for lameing than making able the users thereof."

There is an amusing description of the ancient game ascribed to Herodotus, the father of history, in whose imaginary Tenth Book the following quaint paragraph occurs:

"They obtain the skin of a pig or other beast, and when the skin has been sewn up, in form like an olive fruit, but in size as great as a man's head, in such a way that water poured into it will not run out of it again, they retire to a plain on the other side of the river, and there they fill the hide, not with water, or with anything else than air. Now the hide, filled with air, is driven about by the feet of these young men, by some quickly, but by others more slowly, but of the young men those who are unable to strike the hide with their feet, strike not the hide, but the legs of him whosoever may chance to be nearest to them. But he crieth out, and if possible overthroweth him that struck him."

While cricket only finds its votaries among the few, and is long in getting a foothold in other nations, football fascinates at once and becomes popular the first time it is played. The Chinese, Burmese and Malays are crack players while the natives of India enter into the spirit of the game with an almost religious fervor.

The Malays practice kicking a wickerwork ball from one to the other without touching it with the hand or allowing it to come in contact with the ground. By this practice they become excellent football players.

Each county, each school and in fact each team of players used to have different rules, so that there was an utter lack of uniformity. The great English schools, Eton, Harrow and Rugby, did much to make the modern game one of skill and science. Each school introduced new features and several forms of football were developed. It was not until the year 1860 that Football Clubs came into recognized existence, but still there was not any uniformity in playing. On October 26, 1863, the English Football Association was established and the game began to make progress. The Rugby Union was formed in 1871 and though a strong effort was made to unite the two organizations it was unsuccessful because, "the styles of play of each were so diametrically opposed, that it was found utterly impossible to arrive at a common understanding." Professionalism in football playing was not recognized in England until 1888, though, of course men had played for money before that time.

Professionalism has made the game popular because it has enabled the players to bring it down to the level of a science.

In 1875 Harvard and Yale played their first game of football in accordance with the rules adopted in 1866 which excluded all the brutal features of the game. Soon after the game became popular with all our colleges and from the first of October to the last of November it would almost appear to a casual observer that football was the sole end and aim of the colleges, so enthusiastic are the students over this most ancient form of manly amusement.

THE smallest passenger train in the world is one running through the park of a wealthy country gentleman in England. The cylinders of its locomotive, which is, by the way, proportioned perfectly after one of the big engines on the Great Northern Railroad, are four inches in diameter, and the diameter of the driving wheels is thirty inches. The track upon which this tiny engine and its cars run is eighteen inches in width. Small as it is this engine weighs two and one half tons, and can haul, on a level track, a weight of fifteen tons. The train consists of a passenger and a baggage car which the engine can draw at a speed of twenty-five miles an hour. The rails weigh only nine pounds to the yard.

IN the search lights so necessary in all sea travel or warfare the mirror plays an important part. The electric light can be easily furnished, but the mirrors are scarce and hard to procure. They are not ordinary reflectors which can be cast and molded, but require much care and labor in their construction. They are really concave lenses, backed by silver and hardened vulcanite. The glass is first molded into shape in the ordinary way and then a grinding machine is set to work upon it to give it the necessary curve and polish. It is then tested and, if satisfactory, the silver back is put on by electrolysis and this back is covered by an opaque substance, generally vulcanite. It requires at least a week to turn out a finished mirror suitable for a search light.

MOST persons who have valuable laces think that it would ruin them to be washed, and so allow them to lie for years, turning yellow with age and dust until they drop to pieces from decay. This is a mistake. Laces should be cleansed when necessary as much as any article of clothing, and if carefully done it will add to their beauty and to their durable qualities. It is better, however, to send such things to professional cleaners than to trust their cleansing to ignorant or amateur hands.

TURQUOISE MINING.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE turquoise is at the present time a fashionable gem, and is often seen encircled with diamonds, its exquisite blue contrasting happily with the crystal glitter of its brilliant setting. Until about ten years ago, the markets of the world were supplied for 5000 years by one province in the northeastern part of Persia, and the demand for fine stones has always been in excess of the supply, though inferior turquoises can scarcely be sold at any price. Since it became known that these great mines are nearly exhausted, there has been an incentive for miners to seek this beautiful gem in other countries. Discoveries of turquoise-bearing rock were made several years ago in New Mexico and Arizona, by prospectors who opened up shafts and cuts, that evidently had been worked centuries ago by some unknown race. Stone hammers and other rude implements were found buried beneath the surface of the ground; and, in one place, there is a dump 200 feet high, covering several acres, on which trees three or four hundred years old are growing. In Cochise county, Arizona, there is a deposit of green turquoise, showing traces of having been worked long before the occupation of the country by white men.

The most recently opened turquoise mine in America, and the most valuable one as well, is situated in the southwestern corner of Nevada, about thirty-five miles from the Colorado river, and within ten miles of the boundary line between Nevada and California. To reach it, one leaves the Santa Fe transcontinental railway line at a station on the Mojave desert called Blake, and takes a little mixed passenger and freight train that goes three times a week to the gold-mining camp of Vanderbilt, thirty miles to the north, and 5000 feet above the sea, for the camp is closely encircled by mountains. Here a conveyance must be procured for the seventeen-mile drive to the turquoise mines. Their owner had been a gold prospector for years, and had traveled over almost every foot of ground in that elevated portion of the Mojave desert. One day he came across a ledge which he knew to be similar in character to the turquoise rock of New Mexico, with which he was familiar.

After working awhile, he found that large pits had been excavated in the ledge at some remote period, and afterward filled with debris. At the bottom were numerous hammers and stone polishers of primitive construction, and the sides of the excavations were stained by fire. The ancients extracted precious metals and stones from the ledges by the crude method of heating the rock, then throwing cold water on it until cracks appeared, exposing the treasures to view. A well-defined ledge of trachytic porphyry is shown in these claims, and the metamorphic agencies that produced the gems are plainly visible. All through the rock are turquoises of excellent quality. In most of the claims, which are twelve in number, they are found in the form of nodules, each enclosed in a matrix of kaolin or other clayey stuff; in the others, it appears in streaks or small veins. The great Persian mines seldom extend to a depth of more than one hundred feet, but this formation has been so comprehensively exposed by cross-cuts in a gulch below the present workings that it is known to go down

A TURQUOISE MINE.

350 feet, possibly much farther. The mines were discovered in May, 1897, and produced gems the first year which attracted the attention of experts in precious stones. One light blue specimen weighed sixty-four carats, and was the largest turquoise that had been out in America at that time. Another, darker in shade, weighed thirty-two carats; and another, twenty-seven carats. These were thought remarkable by jewelers; but they were eclipsed in 1898 by two gems, each weighing more than 140 carats, which their owner named "Texas," (for his native State), and "Nevada."

The value of turquoises depends on several things besides their size—color, freedom from blemishes, hardness, and susceptibility to polish. The product of this new mine is proving of the first class, and dealers in the large cities of this country and of Europe are glad to handle it. An objection to many turquoises is that they fade out nearly white in a few months after being cut, when the per cent. of water in them has evaporated. Those found in the Nevada mines bear the brand "True Blue," and stand the color test perfectly. This branch of mining is much less expensive than the extraction of gold or silver ore, with all the attendant details of complicated machinery, costly reduction works, etc. Two or three trustworthy men, with a few simple appliances, can secure enough gems from the soft talo formation to keep a lapidary busy and yield a handsome profit to the owner of the mines.

Though not classed with the most precious stones, large turquoises of fine quality are valuable. A sixty-carat stone is worth $4000. Ring stones retail at from $25 to $100 each, the price being $16 a carat. A large proportion of the rough material taken from the ledges is not marketable at any price, but there is always a demand for good stones. There is a great deal of loss in the cutting, when some of the nodules prove too soft, and others fly to pieces on the wheel. All turquoises do not turn out to be gems. Many sham turquoises are in the market. Odontolite—the tooth or bone of the extinct elephant called the mammoth, is preserved in the ice of Siberia and palmed off as turquoise. It emits an odor when heated by which it can be detected. Callainite is another substance that is sold for the genuine article. Though lighter and duller in color than turquoise, it has sufficient resemblance to the real gem to be deceptive.

Centuries ago, turquoises were highly esteemed. The Aztecs almost revered them. None have ever been produced in Mexico, so it is a question whence came the numerous fine specimens that Friar Mancos de Nixa, Coronado, and others found freely used for ornamentation in the southwestern part of this country, in the 16th century. The most reasonable supposition is that they were obtained from the workings in New Mexico, Arizona and southern Nevada that have recently been reopened. The ambassador sent by Montezuma to Cortez brought four chalchihuitls, (the Mexican term for turquoises), with him, each of them described as being worth more than "a load of gold," and among the crown jewels of Spain are turquoises of great value that were presented to Charles V. by the ruler of the strange new country across the seas. This gem became known in Europe when Alexander the Great and his soldiers returned from their conquests in Asia, bringing with them many rare jewels. Shakespeare has immortalized it by making Shylock declare that he would not have lost his turquoise ring "for a whole wilderness of monkeys." In 1609, an English writer asserted that no gentleman's elegance was complete unless he possessed a fine turquoise. In Germany, it is the favorite engagement ring.

Superstition surrounds the gem with an atmosphere of good luck, in contrast to the glowing opal. According to an Oriental proverb, "A turquoise given by a loving hand carries with it happiness and fortune."

It is the birthstone of all who were born in bleak December, and for such we have the rhyme,

"If cold December gave you birth,
The month of snow and ice and mirth,
Place on your hand a turquoise blue,
Success will bless whate'er you do."

Holland, Its Dykes, Dunes, Canals and Polders.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE existence of Holland today is due to the unceasing struggle of its people to hold that which they have won from the sea by centuries of toil. Winds, waves and grasping neighbors have tested the right of possession with the Hollanders; undismayed, they have continued to pile up ridges of mud, strengthened them by the interlacing fibres of the roots of the willow and poplar trees, and driven millions of piles through the soft morass to reach the firmer soil beneath.

Upon these artificial mounds they built cities and ships to sail from them, originating a commerce which brought wealth and luxury to Holland. Sea walls were constructed, dykes constantly lengthened and strengthened, morasses, lakes and abandoned peat beds drained, a remarkable network of canals furnished communication throughout the country as a once worthless marsh was brought into a condition of extraordinary fertility. It would be well-nigh impossible to find a more sublime picture of patient toil resulting in final triumph, than in the Hollanders' contest with the sea. Eight hundred years ago Holland contained but 600 square miles; the present area is nearly 13,000 square miles, with a dense population of about 5,000,000.

As the larger portion of the land lies below the level of the sea, the dykes and dunes are of the greatest importance in preserving it from the encroachments of the sea, while the canals, windmills and sluices are other features of the elaborate system which prevents the long-baffled waves from engulfing the low lying cities and plains. The dunes or sand hills are formed by the action of winds and waves, while the dykes are a credit to the persevering industry of the plodding Hollanders. These dunes rise on the north coast from thirty to one hundred and thirty feet, and cover and uncover large areas as the winds blow the sand from point to point. These white hills are a fit supplement to the ghostly fogs, the gray, misty atmosphere and other characteristic features of this quaint land.

Many dykes are embankments of earth, clay and sand, held together by the roots of trees that line them or a kind of coarse grass that is planted for that purpose. Others are of the most substantial masonry; hundreds of miles of such have been constructed along the north coast from 25 to 40 feet high and 20 to 30 feet wide at the top. Sometimes wagon roads are laid out on the top of a dyke or a railroad built there giving to the traveller an incomparable view of the "Hollow Land." On the one side the gray North Sea beats against the strong wall that holds it back, and on the other stretches away thrifty Holland with its fertile fields, grazing herds, busy canals, countless windmills, picturesque villages and prosperous cities.

In Friesland alone two hundred miles of the coast is dyked; at one point three rows of piles forty or fifty feet in length have been driven down for sixty miles, then strengthened by great timbers brought from Norway, spiked and banded with iron.

The coast at Helder is exposed to the sweep of the entire North Sea, and to protect it in 1819-1825, the famous Helder dyke was constructed of Norway granite; it is five miles long, from twelve to fifteen feet wide, and the massive bulwarks that hold it in place extend 200 feet into the water. During a storm the waves dash furiously against this barrier, often rising twenty feet above the level of the land it guards. Another upon the island of Walcherin is built of clay, sand, stones and wood, which is noted for its strength and solidity; it is maintained at an annual cost of $30,000.

The hundreds of miles of dykes belong to the Dutch government, which expends $3,000,000 annually in keeping them in good condition. A corps of engineers known as "De Waterstaat," have especial care of the dykes, also of the elaborate system of drainage, by means of the numerous canals, which serve many useful purposes. They drain the country, take the place of fences or hedges and furnish means of communication throughout the land. One of the two principal canals extends from Amsterdam to the Helder, a distance of 46 miles; this is 130 feet wide and twenty feet deep. The North Sea Canal is fifteen miles long, reaching from Amsterdam to the east coast, and is from two to three hundred feet wide. Both of these are provided with immense sluice gates and cost enormous sums.

Not only is the incoming of the sea to be guarded against, but the rivers and lakes are a constant menace. For instance, when the spring rains come in Germany and the heavy snows melt, the Rhine brings down a vast volume of water, which would submerge the whole land without the utmost vigilance. Three immense locks with five, three and two gates have been constructed to control the flow of the waters, if these sluice gates are opened at low tide and the rapid rush of water carries away the sand which has accumulated at high tide, so that the waters can make their exit to the sea.

Night and day, the dykes are guarded by watchmen, whose duty it is to see that not the slightest orifice appears to give entrance to the water, as it would enlarge minute by minute, hour by hour until a great chasm would be made, through which a mighty, rushing flood would overwhelm the land. Their past history has taught the necessity of such constant care; no country has suffered as Holland has from inundations which have drowned thousands of inhabitants, destroyed villages and towns, and permanently submerged great tracts of land. A willful injury to a dyke is accounted a crime, and is punished according to the degree of the offence, by a fine, imprisonment, or, in some aggravated cases, by death. Such extreme measures are of the past; stringent laws, and an enlightened public opinion suffice at this present time.

Another work of the government is reclaiming land that has been submerged for centuries; these lands are called polders, and possess some advantages; the soil is rich, not requiring an artificial stimulant, and as they lie below the level of canals and rivers, the fields never suffer from drought. There are a number of these polders, but the most important one at this time is the Haarlem. An inundation in the sixteenth century united small lakes near Amsterdam, into one, the Haarlem Lake. This was eighteen miles long, nine wide, with an average depth of twelve feet. At high water it invariably overflowed its banks, but in 1836 the destruction of Amsterdam and other cities was threatened, and the government decided to dyke and drain it. The work was completed in 1850, and though it cost more than a million of dollars it has well repaid the expenditure, furnishing homes for 10,000 inhabitants upon fertile farms, where there are the most productive gardens in all Holland.

This was a marvelous feat of engineering skill, but Holland is preparing for a more gigantic one, the draining of the Zuyder Zee. This great gulf only came into existence at the time of a destructive flood in the thirteenth century, and its average depth is only eleven feet. The Haarlem Lake gave back 45,000 acres of land, this will give 500,000. The design is to divide the Zee into four parts, build great dykes, and from one portion after the other, gradually pump out the water, leaving a lake in the centre of the new polder, connected by canals with the other great canals, completing a system of water ways navigable for large ships. The project is colossal; its execution will require thirty years and the estimated cost is $50,000,000.

When the task is finished, Holland will have 800 square miles more of territory adding to her national wealth twelve times the sum expended; at the same time she will have demonstrated anew to the world the courage and moral greatness of a people, who under such natural disadvantages possess the patience, perseverance and skill necessary to compel the waters to give back the lands which they engulfed hundreds of years ago.

Women who suffer with ailments peculiar to their sex, from stooping shoulders, weak back and general ill-health or lack of strength and vitality, will be interested in the advertisement of The Natural Body Brace in another column. AN OBLITERATED TRAGEDY.

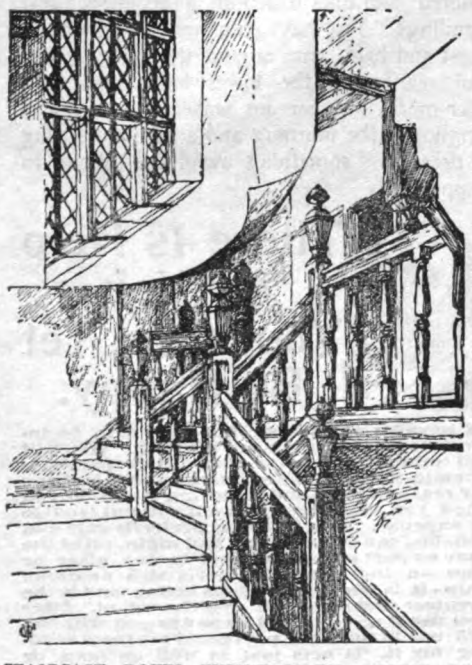
WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE world has seen few tragedies more pathetic than that which culminated when Mary Queen of Scots was executed. Is it merely a coincidence that today, of Fotheringhay Castle, the powerful fortress in which the Queen was beheaded, only one stone remains, and that in all Great Britain no drawing or likeness of the castle can be found.



There is an old legend, current all over England, that when, after the death of Queen Elizabeth, James of Scotland, Queen Mary's son, became king of England, he cursed the castle of Fotheringhay, in which his mother had suffered such an awful death, and commanded that it be blotted off the face of the earth.

Not long ago I spent several weeks at Oundle, an English town two miles from the site of Fotheringhay, and found it interesting to study on the ground itself the history of this spot. Fotheringhay today consists of a tiny village of stone cottages clustered near one of the oldest and quaintest churches in all England. Past the village flows the river Nene, a narrow but deep and sluggish stream. Travelers coming from the south cross the Nene here by an old stone bridge called the "Perio Bridge." Just as this bridge connects Fotheringhay to the southern country so its name links the life of today with the troubled times of Mary and Elizabeth.

It is said that through all the weary years of Mary's imprisonment, before she came to Fotheringhay, she never lost the hope that Queen Elizabeth would eventually pardon her. Six months before her death a royal order came for her to be transferred to Fotheringhay, and she was brought there under guard. Just as the cavalcade reached the bridge over the Nene, a horn was heard to sound not far away. Mary declared that this was a courier coming from the Queen with her pardon, and commanded that her retinue be delayed. Her wish was granted, but after a little delay it was learned that the horn was only that of a huntsman in the forest. When this information was brought to her Mary exclaimed in Latin, which language she spoke fluently, "Perio," which means "I perish." And ever since this has been called the "Perio Bridge."

A huge mound of sand beside the river marks the site of the castle. From the top of this mound it is possible to trace the outlines of the walls and moat which defended the castle. The river Nene was the chief protection on one side. Thistles grow on the mound now, and the damp places which were the moat are masses of forget-me-nots. The sandy mound is honey-combed with rabbit burrows, and even now the energetic legs of these animals sometimes kick out a bit of human bone. Of the castle itself only one stone remains, a big, shapeless rock, weighing several tons, down by the river side.

Romantic as is the legendary reason given for the disappearance of the castle I hardly think, myself, that it is true. It seems more probable that after Queen Mary's death the property changed hands several times, in the wars which followed, and that it was neglected until it was in such poor repair that it was not judged worth restoration. As a result it was sold piecemeal to any one who wanted to buy building material, both wood and stone, until in the course of a hundred years or so all of it was carted away except this one rock, too heavy to be moved intact and of too little value to be quarried. The Talbot Inn, at Oundle, a quaint old hostlery of stone, is said to have been built of material brought from Fotheringhay, and there seems to be good reason to think the rumor true. A superb old oak staircase in the Inn came from the castle, and was undoubtedly the one down which Queen Mary went to her death. I used to stand at the head of these steps, and closing my eyes, imagine that I heard the sweep of the Queen's black velvet gown as the mournful little procession went down to the great hall of the castle.

STAIRCASE DOWN WHICH MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS WENT TO HER DEATH.

Mary was confined at Fotheringhay for the last six months before her execution. It is said that during this time she sowed the seeds of some Scottish thistles sent her, and that the thistles now growing on the castle's site are the result. I do not know that this is so. I only know that the thistles are there, and that the variety is one which is not at all common in that part of England. I dug up a plant and brought it carefully home and set it out in the garden, where, at last accounts it was growing finely.

We who in America can look upon so few monuments of tragic history stand almost appalled on ground like Fotheringhay. The very site itself probably marks a scene of battle, since historians say that the mound on which the castle stood is of artificial construction, built there by the Angles and Danes as a vantage ground from which to defend a ford by which the river was crossed at that point before the bridge was built. The first castle on the spot was built by Simon de St. Liz, who had married a great niece of William the Conqueror. It was almost always royal property, and almost always seemed to bring a curse upon its owner.

One of the first owners of Fotheringhay was Mary of Valence, that unhappy Countess of Pembroke whose husband, married to her only an hour before, was killed at a tournament held to celebrate their wedding. She lived all her life-long widowhood at Fotheringhay and when she died devoted her whole fortune to founding Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, to her husband's memory. Her successor was that Duke of York who was smothered in his armor at the battle of Agincourt. This man's brother Duke of Cambridge, who succeeded him, was beheaded on a charge of conspiracy against King Henry V. The son of the last named owner, another Duke of York, was killed at the battle of Wakefield Green, and his twelve-year-old son was killed with him. This death sent another unhappy widow, the Duchess Cecily, to live for thirty-six years at Fotheringhay, until her own death occurred. While there she had to mourn the cruel death of her two grandsons, the two little Princes in the Tower, and to have only too good reason to fear that their murderer was their own uncle and her son, evil Richard III, who, very fittingly, had been born at Fotheringhay.

Many of these semi-royal personages are buried in or around the old church, and I deciphered on the end of the stone communion table there this inscription: "Sissily, Dutchess of York, Daughter to Raulfe Nevell, first Earl of Westmoreland."

Early in the reign of King Henry VIII he settled Fotheringhay Castle upon his first queen, Catherine of Aragon, who repaired it at great expense, and seems to have been fond of the place until her husband, enamored of some of her successors, proposed to make the castle Queen Catherine's prison. Then she declared that she would never go there again unless "bound with a halter rope." Eventually, though, she was buried at Peterborough Cathedral, only ten miles from Fotheringhay.

Is it any wonder that Mary, Queen of Scots, when she learned that Fotheringhay was to be her destination said that she saw written over the castle gate, "Abandon hope all ye that enter here?"

SENT FREE TO MEN

A Discovery for Lost Manhood Sent Free to Every Sufferer Who Will Write for It.

G. B. WRIGHT WAS RESTORED TO HEALTH AND MAKES A GENEROUS OFFER.

Geo. B. Wright, a merchant and well-known citizen of Marshall, Mich., who was permanently cured of lost manhood and nervous debility after declining health for years offers to send the medical prescription that effected the cure to every reader of COMFORT who is suffering today as he suffered. All who will drop him a letter asking for a copy of the prescription will receive it by return mail free of charge. As certain as a wound leaves a scar, and as sure as effect follows cause, do men live to repent their follies and indiscretions in weakness and suffering. The tortured sufferer may bear no tell-tale marks of ruin upon his face to betray his lost manhood. He goes to his grave a human wreck, and never tells of his sufferings for fear of shame. Such mental anguish at times drives him to the verge of desperation, and he is easy prey for those vultures in human form—quack doctors—who hold out alluring hopes of cure only to disappoint, and after robbing him of his money, plunge him into absolute despair.

No one can appreciate these horrors of lost manhood except he who has suffered them. No one can help such sufferers except he who knows a cure and has himself been restored to full manhood. A notable cure of lost manhood in an extreme case was effected in the person of Geo. B. Wright, a music dealer and well-known citizen of Marshall, Mich. Mr. Wright for years suffered the agony of lost vital power. He saw his physical powers go from him as the result of insidious disease until he was reduced to a condition of senility, and the best doctors in the country gave him up to die.

Like many others, he tried the various remedies offered by specialists for the treatment of weaknesses peculiar to men and it was this experience that drove him to a little study and research for his own benefit.

He asserts that his 10 years' suffering, both mentally and physically, was turned to undoubted joy in a single night through a rare combination of medicines that literally made him young again. It is the prescription of this discovery that his enthusiasm leads him to offer free to any man, young or old, who feels that his animation or the fire of ambition has left him and needs something that will not only brace him up and enable him to be prepared for any undertaking which may present itself but will restore the parts to their original size and vigor.

There is no question but what in his individual case the results were just as described, and it seems quite probable that any man who believes himself to be weak may profit by sending for this free prescription. Many people wonder how he can afford to send this prescription free, but it costs him but little to do so, and he feels a philanthropic interest in giving weak men an opportunity to cure themselves.

A request to G. B. Wright, music dealer, Box 811, Marshall, Mich., for his free prescription, will be promptly and privately complied with by return mail.

A PRIZE

FOR EVERY CORRECT ANSWER

IN making this marvellous offer, we have no desire to pose as benefactors. It is a business transaction to introduce CANDIED CRUSHED CARNATIONS, a delicious and fragrant breath perfume, and all who are awarded a Fountain Pen we require to distribute for us among friends 25 Sample Packages. In order that these may not be received by unappreciative people, we require you to collect 5 cents for each sample, and as this is to advertise, we send a PRIZE TICKET FREE with every package, which entitles each purchaser to a handsome piece of jewellery, which will not cost less than the Breath Perfume. After distributing the 25 Packages and Prize Tickets, you return our $1.25, thus fulfilling your agreement. We then give you for this service, free, and in addition to the Fountain Pen awarded you in the first place, a Solid Gold Shell Ring, beautifully engraved, and all who answer this within three days from when seen first, we send with ring, ALSO free, a Simulative Diamond, Ruby and Saphire Stick Pin.

To many this unparalleled offer may seem impracticable. To such we say it is certainly worth investigating. The risk is nothing. We ask none of your money. We are liberal enough to offer inducements to stimulate our industries never attempted by any similar firm, and we simply ask you to interpret our Puzzle and Send your Address. We award you the Fountain Pen and send, postage paid, 25 Sample Packages of Breath Perfume. Distribute them as instructed, and we give you also the Solid Gold Shell Ring and Pin. Nothing could be more fair. Persons alive to their own interests should avail themselves of this great offer at once.

WE GIVE THIS WATCH

FOR A CLUB OF 4.

Thirty Minutes is a short time, but many have earned one of these watches in less time than that. It is one of the very best watches for time ever offered to our readers at no matter what the price asked for it. We know, of course, there are watches that cost more money, because they are in gold or silver cases, but they will not keep any better time, simply because they cannot. This watch keeps not perfect time, we never saw the watch that did, but it keeps as near perfect time as watches usually do. We have such faith in this watch as a timekeeper that we send with every one a guarantee just as binding as that given with any watch, no matter what make. We are willing to give you this watch if you will do us a slight service, which you can easily do in an hour. We wish to increase our subscription list, and we want the assistance of every reader of this paper to that end. We do not want you to do it for nothing, we will reward you for it. You can easily secure this valuable watch if you get four subscribers to this paper, at our special subscription price of 25 cents a year each. Do this, sending us $1.00, with the names of four subscribers to this paper, and we will send our paper to each subscriber for one year, and we will send you the watch to reward you for your efforts in our behalf. Start out now and see what you can do. Remember we guarantee every watch. If you get five subscribers and send us $1.25 for the same we will also send you a nice chain. CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

WINTER beigns when the Sun reaches his greatest southern declination, as he passes into the sign Capricorn. This occurs this year at about 12 minutes before 8 o'clock in the evening of the 21st day of December, when the last degree of the sign Aries will be on the midheaven and the 10th degree of the sign Leo will be rising in the east. Neptune will be the only heavenly body of the Solar System that will be above the Earth, though the Moon will make its appearance above the eastern horizon soon after 9 o'clock of the same evening. The figure erected for the time at Washington, the seat of government, shows Mercury, Herschel, Saturn, the Sun and Mars all within the bounds of the 5th house; Jupiter will be in the 4th; Venus in the 6th; the Moon on the cusp of 2nd, and Neptune in the 11th house.

The sun is ruler of the scheme and is in trine with the Moon, but besieged by the malefics Saturn and Mars in the 5th near the cusp of the 6th house; which indicates unusual prevalence of diseases involving the lungs and liver; cold will be the primary cause of diseases and mortality will be greater than usual from pneumonia, consumption, typhoid fever, gout and rheumatism. Unusual precautions should be taken in these directions. The malefics all in the 5th house does not promise favorably for hotels, theaters, and public schools. Indeed, some serious catastrophe involving loss of human life and injury to persons from fire or panic is apprehended, and school authorities and parties engaged in catering to public entertainment should be particularly guarded in care of those temporarily under their charge. Some bad eruptive trouble among children is likely and violent disorder or riot in northwestern sections or among the Indian tribes. The Executive authorities are likely to be kept busy in northwestern regions of the country where clash of arms is threatened over international questions. The favorable aspects of the Moon with the Sun, Saturn, and Mars and all with the Midheaven of the figure, with Jupiter angular gives very favorable indications for progress and growth of the Nation and her importance among the Nations of the world. Two Eclipses fall within the limits of the month of December, an annual eclipse of the Sun on the 2nd and a partial eclipse of the Moon on the 16th of the month. The eclipse of the Sun is not visible in this country, but is to be seen in the south polar region and in New Zealand and Southern Australia; indicative of some unusual physical phenomena and changes with disturbances of a political nature. It falls in the sign Sagittarius and near to the malefics in the 5th and 6th house, and in the sign ruling Spain and Hungary; and troubles in those countries continue to come. The partial eclipse of the Moon on the 16th is visible in the United States and generally in both America, Europe, Asia and Africa. The portents of these eclipses falling so near the congress of so many of the heavenly bodies indicates marked physical and political changes in the world at large, both as to rulers and governments. All of the figures emphasize the suggestions already given as to the classes of diseases to be guarded against and as to schools, hotels and theaters.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR DECEMBER, 1899.

DECEMBER. 1—Friday. Begin early and improve every moment of this day, particularly for money ventures; buy goods for trade and deal with officers of large corporations, judges, and those engaged in the ecclesiastical callings; seek money accommodations, adjust accounts, and deal with persons of wealth and station.

2—Saturday. This day has but little to recommend it and the pursuit of routine matters only is recommended.

3—Sunday. The first two-thirds of this day are peculiarly adapted for intellectual engagements and for converse with the philosopher and mathematician; the late afternoon and evening are forbidding and caution is given that strife and contention be studiously avoided; extra care should be had in handling inflammables and explosives for fires and explosions are likely to be more numerous and destructive than usual in these passing days; look out also for hurts from animals and machinery.

4—Monday. The middle hours of the day are the best, particularly for literary labors and dealings with persons in such callings; also with artists, musicians, dramatists and in commercial enterprises concerned with the artistic or decorative in life.

5—Tuesday. Urge all affairs of an honorable nature; have money dealings, consult lawyers, judges, clergymen, bankers, and persons of wealth or who are employed about monied institutions.

6—Wednesday. Push business to the utmost on this day with eccentric characters and with government officers in the afternoon when also change residence and travel. The time is quite unfavorable for persons born about the 15th of March or June or 18th of September or December, of past years, and the majority of such persons, if of mature age, are now in the midst of trying influences and will seem to be baffled in nearly all their undertakings; they should be particularly careful in these winter weeks of their health, avoiding exposure to inclement weather as much as possible and seeing that coughs and colds are not neglected. Many of these are in the midst of strife or litigation and are cautioned against rashness in any of their acts; they should take care that they are not injured physically through their own carelessness.

7—Thursday. Choose the early hours for literary pursuits and mental labors; do important corespondence, and push thy business; make written applications for favor from officers of state and persons in authority; engage servants in the forenoon and deal with printers, booksellers, and intellectual people.

8—Friday. Usurers have a day of profit and advantage, and thou shouldst be wary with thy purse, being sure not to buy goods for any speculative venture; have care in extending credit and see that money is not lost through carelessness.

9—Saturday. Defer important correspondence and avoid business with officers of the government or persons in authority; do not execute any contract, nor travel unnecessarily.

10—Sunday. Bridle your tongue during the forenoon hours lest quarrels come; the mind at this time will specially incline towards the curious in science, art, and mechanism and ingenious, new and unusual ideas are born and peculiar doctrines become attractive; give preference to the afternoon for all mental efforts and for engagements in connection with the world of letters.

11—Monday. Be in no haste to begin any of the elegant pursuits in the morning hours when matters of taste are not favored; see that the inclinations are not extravagant and keep the expenditures under close scrutiny; the mind conceives peculiar and unusual ideas, notions, whims, and inventive capabilities are quickened; the latter part of the day is best for dealing with judges and officers of rank.

12—Tuesday. Choose this day for transactions concerning real estate; deal with the contractor, plumber, ship-builder, miner, machinist, manufacturer, chemist and cattletrader; inaugurate new business connected with machinery or in the nature of manufacture or construction, masonry, excavation, etc.

13—Wednesday. The afternoon is the best part of this day, especially for literary labors or engagements, matters of account or collections, and for commercial contracts pertaining to fancy goods, dress materials, jewelry and all articles of adornment; seek pleasure from the musical or dramatic entertainment in the evening.

14—Thursday. Do not purchase anything for profit on this day and have care that extravagant inclinations are held well in check.

15—Friday. This day is evil and little if any prosperity is likely to attend important undertakings now begun; it is better to save the energies at this time letting the day pass as best it may and resting quietly until a more opportune time; avoid landlords and make no contract with laboring classes.

16—Saturday. Partial Eclipse of the Moon. Conditions are quite unfavorable for any move of an initiative character, especially if concerned with houses or lands; seek no favor from thine employer or from persons in authority. The time is unfavorable for persons born about the 25th of February, 28th of May, 30th of August, or 28th of November of past years, as they are likely at this time to have some mental anxiety over writings, contracts, or matters of account or have nervous or mental excitement or baffling annoyances in their affairs. On the other hand, most of those born about the 26th of January, 27th of March, 29th of July or September, of past years, are likely to be having more profitable and agreeable correspondence, effect more satisfactory business arrangements or contracts, and should improve the time for beginning studies or making important intellectual engagements.

17—Sunday. Seek nothing but rest and quiet during all of this day though the evening hours are to be preferred over the other parts of the day.

18—Monday. A fair day, though it cannot be recommended for the beginning of any very important undertaking; the elegant pursuits are particularly opposed; do not purchase any articles of dress or decoration and be not surprised if little progress is made in any artistic pursuits.

19—Tuesday. Improve every moment of this day; the merchant, traveller and all engaged in monetary affairs, banking, or in the literary pursuits are favored on this day; buy goods for trade; make application to officers of large corporations or government officials for favors; travel and change residence.

20—Wednesday. Peculiarly appropriate during the forenoon hours for engagements pertaining to patents, trade-marks, or any kind of patented wares; urge the literary pursuits early in the day.

21—Thursday. An excellent day; bargain for houses and lands, make contracts for their improvement and deal with aged persons and the agricultural classes.

22—Friday. Be early astir for urging the chemical and mechanical pursuits and dealings in metals and machinery; consult thy dentist; travel; and trade in cattle, hardware and cutlery; the evening is adverse for literary work and mental processes; correspondence is best postponed.

23—Saturday. Urge all undertakings of a scientific, literary or artistic nature and press all general business.

24—Sunday. The day after the morning abounds in benevolence, being especially conducive to religious fervor and inviting communion with the poet, musician and artist and giving special appreciation of the beautiful in religion, nature, and art.

25—Monday. Christmas. Be not impatient in the morning, and as the forenoon advances be active in all literary matters or in removal or travel.

26—Tuesday. Consult and ask favors of aged persons; deal in houses and lands and the produce therefrom and make contracts with builders, masons, miners, farmers, plumbers, and persons generally in the laborious callings.

27—Wednesday. The elegant and artistic pursuits are not favored in the morning, when no purchases of wearing apparel or artistic goods will be satisfactory; seek favor or promotion from public officers or those in authority during the middle hours of the day.

28—Thursday. The forenoon of this day especially encourages all mechanical and chemical pursuits also dealings with cutlers, tailors, policemen, military men, surgeons, and all workers and dealers in glass or metals; as the day advances let every energy be devoted to the prosecution of literary work; make engagements with printers, or publishers; execute contracts; do most important correspondence and begin thy journeyings.

29—Friday. Continue thine efforts of yesterday with unabated zeal, particularly during the forenoon; purchase goods for trade and deal with clothiers, wool-dealers, judges, counsellors, and all persons in the elegant pursuits.

30—Saturday. Give the bulk of thine energies to the pursuit of thy literary engagements; deal with printers, booksellers, and mathematicians.

31—Sunday. The year closes with a very evil day when no matter of importance should be inaugurated in connection with church affairs.

"MADE ME A MAN."

Thousands of Rescued Sufferers from Lost Manhood unite in Praise of CALTHOS.

An Offer Every Sufferer Will Be Sure to Accept.

NO C. O. D. OR DEPOSIT SCHEME.

Read carefully this announcement made by one of the greatest and richest importing firms in the United States. Heed the wise words written here, and accept the generous offer made you. You have the opportunity to be restored once more to robust health and happiness. Accept it now. Do not put it off until it is too late. Since the introduction in this country of CALTHOS, the great French preparation for Lost Manhood, the Von Mohl Company, of Cincinnati, O., has achieved marvelous results. More than 100,000 cures have been made the past year.

Before Prof. Jules Laborde, the famous French Specialist, brought his discovery, CALTHOS, to the knowledge of the world, the best physicians denied that any medicine known to science could restore the vital forces of men, if once lost through overwork, abuse, or excesses. CALTHOS is the greatest sensation in the medical world today. The cures made by CALTHOS (many of the cases of years standing) have attracted the attention of medical men everywhere. The National Medical Board has recommended the remedy for use in Insane Asylums, where, as well known, a majority of the male inmates are victims of lost manhood in its most terrible form, brought on by abuses and youthful error. In Europe the remedy is endorsed by the French and German governments, and is used as a specific in the great standing armies of those countries, and generally in all the famous Sanitariums and Retreats of the Old World.

FREE
5 days' trial treatment

The Von Mohl Company has decided that every man in America who is suffering from Lost Manhood, shall have the opportunity to try out this wonderful remedy CALTHOS in his own individual case. For that purpose they have recently imported 100,000 special 5-day treatments, to give away as a trial, free of any charge whatever. If you suffer from Lost Manhood, Varicocele, Weakness of any nature in the Sexual Organs or nerves, (no matter how caused), or if the parts are undeveloped or have shrunken or wasted away, CALTHOS, will cure and restore you.

CALTHOS is put before you on its merits alone. Put it to the test, try it free. There is no security required. No C. O. D. or Deposit scheme.

Send us your name and address, and The Von Mohl Co. will send you enough "CALTHOS" to last five days. IT WILL BE SENT IN A SEALED PACKAGE BY MAIL. In the quiet of your home you can try it and see what it does.

All correspondence relating to the "CALTHOS" department of our business is strictly confidential. We neither publish nor furnish testimonials. Address applications for trial treatment to

A Complete Outfit of 44 Tools FREE.

GREATEST MONEY MAKER AND MONEY SAVER EVER SEEN: NEEDED IN EVERY HOUSE IN THE WORLD.

Hundreds of dollars are wasted every year in paying for repairs which could be done by you just as well as by the person you hire. "Yes," you will say, "I could do this work if I only had the tools." You have to hire the plumber or cobbler and pay him for his time while you stand around and look on, watching him do the work which you could do as well as he, but it is always that you have no tools. We have put together the best kit of tools for repairing which was ever seen, and we will sell the entire outfit for less than half the money for which you could buy it at any store. The outfit consists of forty-four first-class tools, as shown in the above cut, viz: 1 iron last for men's work; 1 iron last for boy's work; 1 iron last for women's work; 1 iron last for children's work; 1 iron stand for lasts; 1 shoehammer; 1 shoeknife; 1 peg awl handle; 1 peg awl; 1 wrench for peg awl handle; 1 sewing awl handle; 1 sewing awl; 1 stabbing awl handle; 1 stabbing awl; 1 bottle leather cement; 1 bottle rubber cement; 1 bunch bristles; 1 ball shoe thread; 1 ball shoe wax; 1 pkg. clinch nails, 4-8 in.; 1 pkg clinch nails 5-8 in.; 1 pkg. clinch nails, 6-8 in.; 1 pkg. heel nails; 4 prs. heel plates, assorted sizes; 6 harness needles; 1 harness and saw clamp; 1 box slotted rivets, assorted sizes; 1 rivet set for same; 1 harness and belt punch; 1 soldering iron, ready for use; 1 handle for same; 1 bar solder; 1 bar resin; 1 bottle soldering fluid; 1 copy directions for halfsoling, etc., 1 copy directions for soldering all securely packed, together with directions for use, in a neat case. These tools bought at a hardware store separately would cost between $7.00 and $9.00. You can repair boots and shoes, tap and heel them, mend your harness or make a new one, mend all kinds of tinware, repair pumps, plumbing and similar work, and do all kinds of leather work about carriages, etc., as well as repair and mend rubber boots, rubbers, overshoes, and all kinds of rubber made articles. The clamp is used for mending harnesses and filing saws. Has a coil spring and is made of iron. You can easily save five times the cost of this outfit in six months and make a heap of money doing little repairs for your neighbors and others. "A stitch in time saves nine," and if you have these tools in your house you can make repairs and save a great deal of money which you would pay if you let a break go or hired a man to do your repairing work for you. Every one of these tools are full sized, practical, neat and cheap. It is the only complete outfit in the market and thousands have been sold in past years for $3.00 when the outfit contained but about half as many smaller articles to people living in the country and small towns as well as in the city. This repairing outfit, weighing 20 lbs. will be sent by freight complete as above described for only $1.62 which includes a 6 months' trial subscription to this paper.

GREAT PREMIUM OFFER.—If you will get up a club of 7 yearly trial subscribers to this paper at the special price of 25 cents each, we will send you one of these repairing outfits as a present to you.

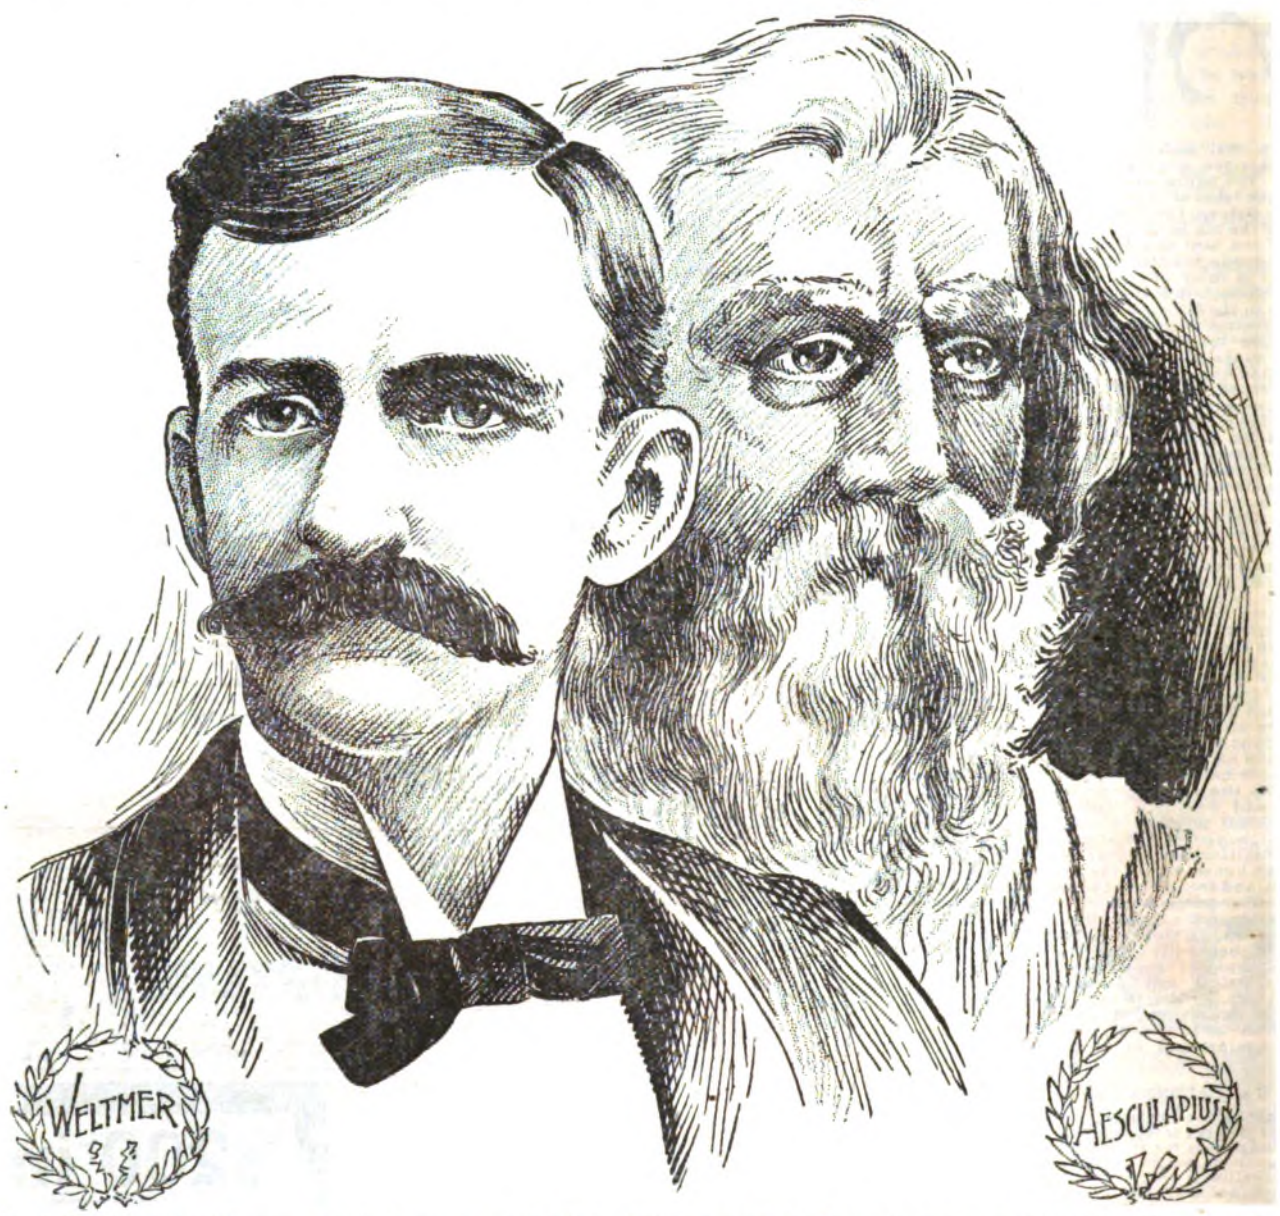
THE WIZARD of the WEST.

Prof. S. A. Weltmer of Nevada, Mo., Who Heals Disease Without the Aid of Drugs or the Surgeon's Knife, Compared With the Healing God of 292 B. C.



By the Absent Method Weltmerism Annihilates Space and Makes it Unnecessary To Go To Nevada for Treatment.

THIS WONDERFUL DISCOVERY REVEALED TO ALL.

The phenomenal cures made by Prof. S. A. Weltmer of Nevada, Mo., have been so astounding and wonderful as to attract the attention of scientists and physicians throughout the world. An eminent physician who has won the esteem of the medical profession by his history of Aesculapius, the healing god, known in B. C. 292, says: While it is true that we are told that Aesculapius became so efficient in the healing art that he actually succeeded so far as to restore the dead to life, and in this way offended Pluto who complained to Jove of the innovation and Jove slew Aesculapius by a flash of lightning, still in making my researches up to the present day, I can say without hesitation that Prof. S. A. Weltmer, the great Nevada, Mo., Scientist, who originated the Method of Magnetic Healing, known as Weltmerism, has done more for science and humanity than did Aesculapius, for this wonderful man has followed the precept of the Living Christ. In this I do not mean to be sacreligious but to emphasize my statement by saying that the Great Nevada (Mo.) Scientist is following in the path made by Him who was born at Bethlehem, and healing without drugs or the surgeon's knife. Again, Prof. S. A. Weltmer is more generous to humanity than was Aesculapius, for the latter had a few followers, known as the Asclepiades, who were bound by an oath not to divulge the secret of the healing art, while any one placing themselves in communication with Prof. S. A. Weltmer can receive instructions from him, for he is most anxious to teach his art to others, that the great method, of which he is the founder, may live and continue to bring the afflicted to health and happiness, even after he has passed to the great majority. Weltmerism has been so perfected that in its wide scope it reaches all classes of people, for this wonderful curative power annihilates space and cures patients at a distance just as readily as it does those who go to Nevada for treatment. Thousands of testimonials from worthy people in every walk of life, are in possession of the American School of Magnetic Healing of Nevada, Mo., and the seeming miracles performed by this great scientist are so wonderful that they would be doubted by the skeptical ones if the proofs were not so positive. Through the courtesy of Prof. J. H. Kelly, the eminent co-laborer of Prof. Weltmer, we are permitted to publish a few of the thousands of testimonials in his possession:

Mrs. Lucy A. Shook, wife of Rev. H. C. Shook, Minister of the M. E. Church, Bucklin, Mo., suffered for five years with constipation, indigestion and poor circulation. She was under the constant treatment of medical doctors, but continued to grow worse, until finally she decided to go to Nevada, Mo., for treatment. One physician, with fifty years' practice, told her she would never reach the Weltmer Institute alive. Her husband strongly opposed her taking the Weltmer Treatment, as he had no faith in it, but finally consented as he did not want to oppose his wife's wishes longer, as he believed her a dying woman. Mrs. Shook was brought to the Weltmer Institute on a stretcher; she took six treatments and is now a well woman. Rev. Shook left Nevada with his wife most enthusiastic over her cure and is now a firm believer of Weltmerism.

Hon. Press Irons, Mayor of Nevada, was afflicted with kidney and bladder troubles for ten years and could find no relief in the usual remedies. In one week he was completely restored by Prof. Weltmer.

Mr. John S. Small, Colfax, Ill., was deaf in his left ear for seven years; could not hear a watch tick when placed against this ear. Was permanently cured in three days by Prof. Weltmer. Mr. L. W. Rains, a wealthy lumberman of Hornbeak, Tenn., suffered constantly with kidney trouble for twenty years; also with constipation and prostatic troubles. Exhausted the best medical skill, but to no relief. He fortunately heard of Prof. Weltmer, and was soon restored to perfect health, and now says this treatment will cure anybody. Mrs. M. E. Hawkins, Louisburg, Kan., was afflicted twenty years with prolapsus and enlargement of the womb, indigestion and perpetual headache. Tried everything that offered relief and gave up in despair. Heard of Prof. Weltmer, took his treatment one week and was permanently restored to health.

Prof. Weltmer also possesses the remarkable ability to cure people at a distance, and hundreds have been restored in this way. Mr. G. W. Hightower, Tiff City, Mo., was a total wreck, having suffered many years with stomach, liver and kindred troubles. Tried everything without relief. Fully restored by Prof. Weltmer's Absent Method.

Mrs. Minnie Porter, Texarkana, Tex., was afflicted for eighteen months with kidney and other diseases, and for twelve months unable to get out of her bed. Was expected to die at any time. Permanently cured by Prof. Weltmer's Absent Method and has gained sixty-five pounds.

Mrs. Lavisa Dudley, Barry, Ill., suffered for thirty years with neuralgia and stomach troubles. Nothing but morphine would relieve her. Permanently cured in a few weeks by the Absent Method of Treatment.

Mrs. M. A. Devault, Defiance, O., was afflicted five years with dropsy, stomach and kidney troubles. Could get no relief from medical science. Was fully restored by Absent Treatment in ten days.

Mrs. M. M. Walker, Poca, W. Va., suffered with eczema, indigestion and female troubles. Dozens of doctors failed to give any relief. She was permanently restored by Prof. Weltmer's Absent Method in two months.

Mrs. Jennie L. Linch, Lakeview, Mo., was for two years afflicted with ulceration of the womb, heart and stomach troubles and general debility; was reduced to a mere skeleton. After taking gallons of obnoxious medicines without relief, she tried the Weltmer Absent Treatment. In less than thirty days she was entirely relieved and gained fifteen pounds.

The Weltmer Method has cured thousands of helpless invalids. In fact, the cures have been so marvelous it can be said there is no disease known that it will not reach. The Absent Method by curing at a distance makes it possible for Prof. Weltmer to benefit all classes of people. There can be but one logical reason given for the grand work done by Weltmerism and that is, it has a greater grasp upon scientific truth than any other method known to mankind.

Any of the readers of the COMFORT writing to Prof. S. A. Weltmer, Nevada, Mo., will receive free of charge the MAGNETIC JOURNAL, a 40-page illustrated magazine and a list of remarkable cures positively proving the wonderful power of this method over all diseases.

PROF. J. H. KELLY.

Secretary American School of Magnetic Healing.

LEARN THIS NOBLE PROFESSION.

The American School of Magnetic Healing is organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, and is a chartered institute founded for the purpose of teaching the new method of Magnetic Healing, known as Weltmerism. Prof. Weltmer is the president and Prof. Kelly the secretary and treasurer of this school. The method perfected by the American School of Magnetic Healing is so complete in all its details that the students become as efficient as Prof. Weltmer himself in this art to cure in ten days. This noble profession, which is taught either by mail or personal instruction, by its application cures and benefits the delicate and nervous woman of all the ailments known to woman; the overworked man, whose very manhood and vigor are lost by exertions and indiscretions; the sickly child; in fact it reaches all diseases known to the human frame and gives the possessor of this wonderful art a power that never was held by man until Weltmerism became a fact. You can become perfect in Magnetic Healing; no argument can be put forth to the contrary. It is a power born in every human, just like the faculty of speech, and only needs to be brought to the surface. The hundreds of successful students of the American School of Magnetic Healing, who are now healing the sick in every portion of the country, are positive proof that any one who desires can learn this profession, and any one who learns can practice it. There is no nobler or better paying profession. Prof. Weltmer finds it impossible to attend to the enormous demands made upon him to cure; he therefore wishes others to take up his profession, so that he may call upon them to assist him in his noble work. He also wishes to perpetuate Weltmerism, as he is positive that in the near future it will revolutionize the art to cure. He also knows the only way to perpetuate it and make Weltmerism the standard for all times to come is to teach his profession to others.

Prof. J. H. Kelly, Sec'y., Nevada, Mo.:

Dear Sir:—Your mail course in Magnetic Healing was received some months ago. After reading some, I caught your idea and at once proceeded to put it into practice, and found I could accomplish all and even more than I anticipated. I have never failed to get immediate results in all cases treated, and I have made a number of cures in cases that have been given up by the best of our physicians as incurable. I expect to devote my entire time to this work, but should I never use it outside of myself or family, would consider it the best investment I ever made.

J. T. IGLEHART, Meridian, Miss.

Thousands of letters in possession of Prof. Kelly, the secretary, are abundant proof that any one can learn this grand profession in ten days. For full instructions free, address

HAND AND FOOT.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY HOWARD MARCUS STRONG.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

DESPITE the noise of the street I could hear the rumble of the great presses in the basements. The smell of fresh ink that reached my nostrils was sweeter than incense. This was Newspaper Row, and these were the monsters I had come to conquer. When hunger finally urged its claim I turned into the nearest restaurant and ordered my first meal in the city.

Although so taken up with my own thoughts I was soon conscious of being steadily regarded by a white-faced young man across the table. He had finished eating but still sat in his chair, nervously picking to pieces a menu card.

"Pardon me," he said, suddenly leaning forward, "are you a stranger in the city?"

I merely nodded assent.

"It's not very long since I came to the city," he continued, "and it won't be long till I leave it. I have been very lonely."

There was something so pathetic in his tone that my reserve was immediately cast aside.

"You are the first person I have talked to for days," he sighed. "There was no one to go to for advice or encouragement. Oh, I am sick of it all! Have you any friends in this awful maelstrom?"

"None," I replied; "I am a country boy, and I have come to the city to make my start as a journalist."

The young man regarded me pityingly for a moment and then broke into a harsh laugh. While he laughed the tears welled up in his eyes.

"Forgive me!" he cried; "I am all unstrung. I was laughing at my own failure. God grant that you may meet with better luck. Don't you understand? My ambition was the same as yours; but I have given up the struggle."

"And have you never met with any success?" I asked.

"Only once," he replied, with a faint smile, "and that was by chance. Last Saturday night my finances and the thermometer both registered exactly ten above zero. Like the night my prospects were black and cheerless. I had been the rounds of the papers and none of them needed any help or would take the time to look at my work. My clothing was thin and the east wind cut through me with every blast. I was weak with hunger and sick with disappointment. In the street where I room there is a little German bakeshop, and in the rear of the shop is one small table, where you can be served with baked beans in winter or ice cream in summer. I turned in there and expended ten cents—the last I had in the world.

"The door opened shortly after my entrance and a young woman came in hesitatingly. After a word with the old baker she came back to the table and seated herself opposite me. By her hollow eyes and poor clothing I judged that her circumstances were as desperate as mine. How I pitied her! Just as I was making up my mind to speak of the stormy night, the baker gave a frightened cry and let the bean-pot crash to the floor.

"'Mine Gott!' he roared, 'a hand—and in the beans! Ah, friends, do not eat of what I have set before you. I have discovered the hand of a man baked to a crisp with my beans!'

"The young woman turned very white, and I no longer had any appetite.

"'Look for yourselves!' the baker continued excitedly, holding up a brown hand on the prongs of his fork. 'This in the bean-pot where the fat pork should have been.'

"The sight was too much for the young woman; she fainted in her chair. The noise had alarmed the baker's wife and she came into the shop to learn the cause of the disturbance.

"'Take this young woman to your room,' I commanded. 'See, she has fainted and needs attention.'

"As the motherly old lady disappeared with the limp form of the girl in her arms, I turned to the baker.

"'You thick-headed fool!' I cried. 'Had you no better sense than to speak of it? Come, let us have a look at the baked hand.'

"The German leaned against the wall and gasped for breath, while his eyes almost started from their sockets. Reaching over the counter I took the fork from his trembling grasp and examined the impaled hand closely. The member was an artificial one. The composition had been shriveled and discolored by the heat, and was truly an unpleasant sight. It was some time before I could convince the baker of the truth of my discovery, and then he insisted that I should take the thing away with me and say nothing of the occurrence.

"I put the hand in my pocket and departed, but did not promise to keep the matter a secret for it had given me a new idea. Going to my room I wrote out an elaborately padded account of the incident, and the next morning succeeded in disposing of it to one of the papers. I have just now been celebrating the receipt of my check by indulging in a hearty meal. How I wish that the young woman could share it," he added. "I cannot get her out of my thoughts. Her face was beautiful to me. I have never had any affairs of the heart, but—" He stopped abruptly and rose from the table.

"Won't you tell me your name?" I said. "I would be glad to know you."

"My name is Unknown," he replied bitterly.

"But," I persisted, "unless you give me your address I will probably never meet you again."

"My address," he answered sadly, "is Obscurity Flats, top floor, back. You will never meet me again and for that reason I want to leave a little remembrance with you. It was given to me by an old black man when I was a boy down in Virginia."

Before I could offer a word of protest he forced a gray rabbit foot into my hand and hurried away.

Two days later I saw in the paper an account of a suicide. A young man, name unknown, had ended his life at a miserable lodging house in a destitute quarter of the city. The description of his appearance was not very lucid, but I imagined that it was my friend of the restaurant. The idea grew on me until it reached the stage of a settled conviction. The paper stated that he would be buried by the city, and knowing that the poor fellow was friendless, I felt constrained to attend the sad funeral.

Calling a cab and giving the proper direction I was driven to the dreary tenement where he had given up the struggle for existence. As I stepped to the pavement a small avalanche of snow slid from the roof of the building and hurled me to the ground. I had not been the only victim, for, as I regained my feet the cabman was lifting a young woman from the snow.

"I am not hurt," she replied to my inquiries, and then moved on, shivering with the cold.

In answer to my knock a woman informed me that they had just left with the poor young man—they were hardly around the corner yet, she thought. Again I entered the cab, after instructing the driver to overtake the meager cortege and follow it to the place of burial.

With the exception of a few officials I was the only mourner; but my grief was sincere for I could not help but wonder if this would be the end of all my own hopes and ambitions. When the services were over one of the men asked leave to return with me in the cab. We were scarcely seated when he began to overwhelm me with congratulations.

"No, no," he said, "of course you can't imagine what it's all about—your surprise is natural—good news, though, I assure you. Fifty thousand doesn't come to every man so easily. Hard to believe, isn't it?"

"Sir," I said, "you are mistaken in the person. You do not know me."

"Good," he chuckled. "O very good, on my word! Lucky fellow! My fortunate young sir, old Glenn was undoubtedly eccentric, miserly; he had no friends—refused to recognize his own relatives—strange creature. He made his money baking beans and peddling them about—minus one hand from birth—lost his artificial one once in a pot of beans. You may have read of it in the paper—good story—well written up. But he had one soft spot, did Glenn. 'If by chance there be one who voluntarily attends my funeral,' so reads the will, 'to him I give and bequeath the sum of fifty thousand dollars, this being the entire amount of my savings. And if none such appears, the said sum is to be converted into bank bills and publicly burned.' It's all rock-bound, sir, for I drew up his last will and testament myself—V. Crubleigh, attorney-at-law."

From sheer surprise I remained speechless. The coachman must have followed the wrong funeral—and with what results!

"I cannot think of it, Mr. Crubleigh," I said at length. "It is not rightfully mine."

"Bosh!" he cried. "O bosh! you have to take it—law awards it. I must have the will robated as soon as possible. Then if you choose to remember the humble instrument of your good fortune, by a modest gratuity, you will earn the everlasting gratitude of V. Crubleigh and family."

I was never fully convinced of the lawyer's truthfulness until the sum of fifty thousand dollars was finally placed to my credit at the bank. And by that time I was not in the least inclined to refuse the legacy. Having made Crubleigh happy, my next thought was of the young woman who had so concerned my friend of the restaurant. I determined to assist her if it lay within my power, and with that end in view, I advertised for the young woman that had been in the German bakeshop the night of the startling discovery.

The following day I received an answer by mail. I wrote to the address requesting a personal interview, and in the evening a man came to my room with a note. I was to go with him to where the young woman was staying. My guide was a kindly old German, and he finally acknowledged that he was the proprietor of the bakery. The person I wished to see was staying at his house—had been since the night she fainted.

The baker took me to a room directly over the shop, and there I was introduced to the young lady—Miss Laird. I immediately recognized her as the pedestrian that the cabman had rescued from the fall of snow on the day of the funeral. In a few words I detailed to her my strange fortune and the motive that had prompted me to come with an offer of assistance. During the recital her cheeks paled and flushed, and toward the last a broad smile played over her face.

"You are very kind," she said, when I had finished, "but you seem to be under the guidance of a strange fate. First of all, I will tell you that I am a niece of old Isaiah Glenn, whose fortune you now enjoy. I came to the city to study music, and hoped that my uncle would give me a little aid, but he would never recognize me as one of his kindred. The strangest thing, however, is that you thought Mr. Gordon had committed suicide; for that is who you met in the restaurant."

"And is he alive?," I exclaimed.

"Yes," she replied; "alive and in the next room. I will call him."

"So you had me dead and buried," said a voice at my side. It was the young man of the restaurant. "Well, I don't deny suicidal intent when I left you; but the same day I met Miss Laird, and now life has some very attractive prospects for me. You have certainly struck it rich—I confess to eavesdropping."

"Yes," I replied; "but the money shall all be turned over to Miss Laird without delay. It is rightfully hers." This heroic resolve had cost me a great effort; but few of us are proof against occasional attacks of better feelings.

"You will do nothing of the kind," said Miss Laird, suddenly entering the room. "I will not touch a cent of it. Only think, the money would have been destroyed if you had not carried out the strange conditions."

"I am determined," I said.

"And I am resolved," she persisted.

"Better compromise," suggested Gordon. "We all know the value of a dollar pretty accurately, and half of fifty thousand looks very large. Perhaps each of you could be satisfied with a part." And that is the way it was finally arranged.

"All our happiness has in some way been due to that baked hand," Miss Laird observed, as I was about to leave them for the evening. "It has brought all of us good luck."

"It was not the hand," I declared. "The rabbit foot was the real charm. And now I suppose it must revert to its original owner."

"Keep it," laughed Gordon. "I have secured a charm that is far more potent." And he must have spoken truly, for to-day he is a distinguished light in the journalistic firmament.

The Lesson of the Christ Child.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY SARAH E. GANNETT.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

THIS story is not written by Dickens, neither is it a tale of the slums, but is a true account of my own experience—of my sin and the lesson taught me—and that I may profit by the wisdom I have gained is my daily prayer. That I may not fail of doing so I am now writing out, for my own use, the account of that bitterly unhappy time when I cared only for myself and my own pleasure.

I am the mother of two of the sweetest girls ever sent to brighten the life of a selfish woman. Once I did not think this of them, but imagined them to be the torment of my days, a constant hindrance to the life of ease which I wished to lead, and possessed of all the sins known to the Evil one. How could I have been so wicked, so unthankful! I only wonder that the dears have the least love remaining for me; but far from remembering past unkindness they are constantly hugging and kissing me "because we love you so."

I was a young, thoughtless girl when my husband married me, an only daughter who had always had her own sweet will and learned very little except what she chose. My home was in the country, and my mother was a farmer's wife, hard-working and far from strong, and during her frequent ill turns I was obliged, from necessity, to cook and look after the house and family; but, although in this way I acquired some knowledge of the duties of a house-mother, I cordially hated them, and when I married and had a house of my own to manage, I despised the work, and instead of taking interest and pride in keeping the house neat and tidy and serving to my husband dainty and well-cooked meals, I shirked all that I possibly could. My house was seldom swept or dusted; the stove never blacked unless Lawrence, who is the sweetest tempered, most patient man alive, did it for me. Beds often lay unmade all day that I might run in the streets, and roaches, spiders and ants lived unmolested in kitchen and pantry. The food—well, the less said of my muddy coffee, my sour bread and my burned meats the better. I do not do things in that way now.

By and by the baby came, and for a time I was proud of her and took pains that she should be sweet and clean and happy. Lawrence hired a woman to help me, too, so my work was lighter and house and food showed a marked improvement; but time passed on and another baby took up its abode with us, and then reverses came. Some competition between northern and southern cotton mills lowered the price of their goods and caused a consequent reduction in the wages of the workmen. Lawrence struggled on for a while, hoping the depression in business would be short, but was finally obliged to tell me that he could no longer afford to pay for help in the house. He was very good, although I did not see it then as I do now. He worked all the time he was at home trying to lighten my labors, and denied himself every luxury that he might furnish me with pleasures and try to

HEART DISEASE

Some Facts Regarding the Rapid Increase of Heart Trouble.

Heart trouble, at least among the Americans, is certainly increasing and while this may be largely due to the excitement and worry of American business life, it is more often the result of weak stomachs, of poor digestion.

Real organic disease is incurable; but not one case in a hundred of heart trouble is organic.

The close relation between heart trouble and poor digestion is because both organs are controlled by the same great nerves, the Sympathic and Pneumogastric.

In another way, also the heart is affected by the form of poor digestion which causes gas and fermentation from half digested food. There is a feeling of oppression and heaviness in the chest caused by pressure of the distended stomach on the heart and lungs, interfering with their action; hence arises palpitation and short breath.

Poor digestion also poisons the blood, making it thin and watery, which irritates and weakens the heart.

The most sensible treatment for heart trouble is to improve the digestion and to insure the prompt assimilation of food.

This can be done by the regular use after meals of some safe, pleasant and effective digestive preparation, like Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, which may be found at most drug stores, and which contain valuable, harmless, digestive elements in a pleasant, convenient form.

It is safe to say that the regular persistent use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets at meal time will cure any form of stomach trouble except cancer of the stomach.

bring a smile to my gloomy face; but I would not be happy or contented. I was constantly fretting and scolding, and my house, the children and myself were dirty and ill-kept.

Thus time went on until Martha was seven years old and Elsie five. One evening in November, we all sat around the kitchen stove, the children playing with some bobbins which their father had brought them home, while he busied himself in making them a cart with bobbins for wheels, and I was trying to do the weekly mending by the light of a dirty, ill-smelling, coal-oil lamp. Little Martha had been sitting quietly for some time looking about her in a thoughtful way she often has, and suddenly she said, wistfully: "I wish we could sit in the sitting-room evenings, like they do at Jeannie Stewart's, and have a pretty lamp like theirs, and wear pretty dresses."

Lawrence glanced up, rather fearfully, I thought, and tried to hush the child, but she went on:

"Jeannie's mother is going to let her hang her stocking on Christmas eve, and have a tree Christmas morning, too. I wish we could have a Christmas tree, mother. We never had one, or hung our stocking, either."

"You can have a Christmas tree, fast enough, if you want one," I answered, grimly.

Lawrence glanced at me in surprise, and I went on:

"Just ask your father to cut you one and stick it up in the snow."

"But that won't be a Christmas tree, mother. It has to be in the house and have presents on it, Jeannie said," urged Martha, timidly.

"Well, if you think I am going to all that trouble for you young ones you are quite mistaken! and where do you suppose the money is coming from to buy the presents, I should like to know? No, you'll get no Christmas this year."

"But Mattie," said Lawrence, gently, seeing the bitter disappointment on the little faces, "suppose we let them hang their stockings this year; it is too bad for them to grow up and miss all the fun of Christmas. I can get some trifles to fill them that will not cost much, I am sure."

"Lawrence Dean," I broke in, furiously. "Haven't I said that I wouldn't be bothered with Christmas doings? I have cares enough already, and I won't have any Christmas hurra and clutter to look after. Now hear me! Martha and Elsie, you go to bed this minute. It's past your bedtime, and I've got a horrid cold coming on and am going to bed quickly as I can get there," and I sprang up and began my preparations for the night, scolding all the while.

The next morning my cold was bad, and the day after Lawrence got me a doctor and a nurse, and after that, for two or three weeks, I remember nothing but suffering and distress for breath. One night there came a change, and I heard them say that I could not last long. I did not care. I was too spent with suffering to care. I only knew that I was relieved from pain, and I lay in a dull stupor. Suddenly a light shone around me, and from its midst stood out the figure of a beautiful boy in shining white garments, with his serene blue eyes fixed upon me as I lay helpless before him. He spoke, and the sweet tones thrilled me like music.

"You are nearly through with your earthly life," he said. "Would you like, before you pass away from them, to see what will be the future life of those you are leaving?"

I gazed at him in astonished silence, and he continued:

"I am the Christ-Child, the anniversary of whose birth upon the earth you refuse to allow your little ones to celebrate. Come, see the effects of your training," and he laid his hand gently upon mine.

I arose, impelled by the power of his sweet presence, and followed him until we came to a great, glowing mirror. Here he paused and swept his hand over its surface.

"Look!" he said, quietly, and I gazed straight down into my own familiar kitchen. Lawrence and the children were sitting there, and a bright fire was burning in the polished stove, a nice supper was on the table, and everything was clean and tidy.

"Papa," I heard Elsie say, "it is so nice here! Jane does things better than mamma did papa."

Lawrence did not answer the child, but I saw him wince, and his hand and lip trembled.

"This is the memory which your children have of you," said the Christ-Child, sadly, as he passed his hand once more over the mirror. Again I looked.

Martha and Elsie were growing up now, hard, unlovely and unloving, with coarse faces and flashy clothing. A friend was trying to persuade them to give money and help at Christmas time to make a happy day for friendless children.

"No," they replied to her persuasion, "we never had a Christmas in our lives. Our mother did not believe in it, and we are not going to waste our money on other people. We have enough to do to look out for ourselves," and the picture faded.

"This is the heritage which you left your daughters," said the sweet voice at my side, and once more its owner swept the surface of mirror, and I caught a glimpse of Elsie strolling through a brilliantly lighted street leaning on the arm of a man whose face made me shudder, so evil was it.

I could bear no more, and with a cry of—"I will not die, oh, I will not die! Let me have one more chance to be a mother to my girls!" I opened my eyes to find myself still in bed and Lawrence's dear face bending over me.

"Oh, Lawrence," I whispered weakly, "hold me, keep me, do not let me die!"

"No, my darling," he answered, gently, "you will not die. You are better," and I believed him, and sank into a refreshing sleep holding his hand.

I mended rapidly, and two days later, when Lawrence came in from his work I said to him:

"Lawrence, when is Christmas?"

"To-morrow, dearie."

"So soon? I have lost a deal of time lying in this bed."

"Never mind that," answered Lawrence, with his loving eyes upon me; "we have you still. Two days ago we thought you were slipping away from us. We can bear anything now you have come back!"

I broke down at that and sobbed out:

"Oh, I have not been a good wife and mother!" and then I told him my strange vision and begged him to help me right the wrong I had done.

"Surely, surely," said the dear man, cheerily. "We'll have a lovely Christmas, to begin with. Shall we have the little tree?—and the stockings?"

"Oh, but the cost, Lawrence! and I have been such an expense to you."

"Never mind that. I'll soon make that all up, and the tree and the gifts shall not cost much," and Lawrence kissed me and went out to make his preparations for the Christmas festivities, to tell the children of the good time in prospect, and to send them in to me to hang their stockings at my chimney side, while I buried my face in the pillows and thanked my Heavenly Father that I still had time to mould my little ones into the noble, unselfish women He intended them to be, and save them from becoming the horrible creatures I had seen them in my vision.

SENSELESS SACRIFICES TO SUPERSTITION.

THE HUMAN SACRIFICES OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

It was the custom of the ancient Britons to honor Woden with a gigantic holocaust. A huge figure, bearing the rude outlines of a man, was fashioned of wicker work, and into this figure were thrust the struggling forms of men and women. Then the priests applied fire to the structure and the miserable victims of human superstition were roasted to death. We shudder as we think of such barbarism. We give thanks that we live in the nineteenth century and in free America. And yet, in this free land, superstition has its votaries and its victims. Statistics prove that each year one-sixth of all the men and women who die are victims of a disease popularly regarded as incurable—the dread disease, consumption. It would be absurd to deny that in certain stages the victim of consumption is beyond the help of the scientific knowledge of the present day, though every year science grows stronger to aid the consumptive. It is equally absurd to deny that there is abundant evidence that bronchitis, obstinate, lingering cough, bleeding of the lungs, and conditions in general which terminate in consumption, are being cured daily by the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery.

Why, then, are men willing to accept the theory that they are lost to health and happiness? Why do they accept a horrible doom with scarcely a struggle? Because of hope by superstition. The priests of this superstition, the medical men, have said: "Nothing can be done for you," and they accept the dictum and sit down and await their fate. The general attitude of the average medical practitioner toward the sufferer from lung disease is cruel to the extreme. Having no help to offer himself, he denies that there is any help to be found. He pooh poohs a reliable remedy and says don't waste your money, or, as Mr. McCawley's physician said of "Golden Medical Discovery," "You may as well take so much water."

Yet Mr. McCawley took "Golden Medical Discovery" and was cured. He saw a testimonial from a man who had been cured of a diseased condition similar to his own. The doctors couldn't help him; they said it was "a case of die anyway," as Mr. McCawley looked at it. But he was a cautious man. He wrote to the man who claimed to have been cured by Dr. Pierce's medicine before he wrote to Dr. Pierce. That was business.

These testimonials are genuine and honest, and one fact will be noted in almost all of them—that the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery was not begun until the doctors failed to help or pronounced the doom of death.

The one vital question to you if you are sick will be—

WHAT IS MY CHANCE?

Can I be cured? Look at the facts. Read over the testimonials given below and then answer that question in the light of common sense. These people who were cured had lungs just like your lungs, and blood just like your blood. That's the main point to remember. The symptoms may vary, but the body is the same always, and the work of healing to be done in that body is the same in every case. At the least your "chance" of cure is as good as any of those whose testimonials have been given. But there's a brighter word of encouragement for you yet, in the fact that Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has cured ninety-eight per cent. of all who have given it a fair and faithful trial. Now read these testimonials until you get the facts by heart.

"Twenty-five years ago when I was thirteen years old, I had, what the doctor called consumption," writes Mrs. Ella Taylor Dodge, Matron of the Home for Missionaries' Children, Morgan Park, Ill., Box 165. "He told my mother that nothing could be done for me excepting to make me as comfortable as possible. The pastor of the M. E. Church in the place where I lived heard of my condition, and, although he was not acquainted with our family, he called, and during the call asked my mother if she would allow me to take a medicine if he would send it to me. She thought that it could do no harm if it did no good, so he sent a bottle of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. Before the bottle was empty my friends saw a little improvement in my health, whereupon another bottle was bought. I can't say now just how much I took, but I improved steadily, and to-day am a well woman, as you may imagine I must be to have the care of this Home. I have unbounded faith in 'Golden Medical Discovery.'"

"About five years ago," writes Cornelius McCawley, Esq., of Leechburg, Armstrong Co., Pa. "I was taken with hemorrhages, and I had eighty-one of them in all; sometimes spitting five pints of blood at one time. It brought me down so low that I could not walk nor get any sleep. I tried a great many things and went to doctors in Pittsburg, but got no relief. My friends gave me up to die, and indeed gathered two or three times—to see me die. My doctor did all he could for me, was very attentive, but could not stop the hemorrhages, and all gave me up to die, with consumption. I got a little book of Dr. Pierce's, and while looking over the names in the pamphlet of those who stated that they had been cured by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery I found one case that seemed to be exactly like mine—the case of Mr. C. H. Harris. I sat down and wrote to him, describing my case. In about one week I got an answer from him, telling me that Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery saved his life, and he advised me to try it. I told my doctor I would try it, and he said 'You may as well take water,' but I thought it was only 'die' anyway, I wrote to you and commenced the use of the 'Golden Medical Discovery' and Sage's Catarrh Remedy. When I had taken six bottles I had eight bad hemorrhages; wrote to you and you sent me word to keep on with the 'Discovery' and the hemorrhage would stop after a while. I thank the Lord it did. That was over two years ago and I have not had any bleeding since."

If you are suffering from disease in chronic form write to Dr. Pierce, and consult him free, by letter. The offer to you of a free consultation by letter means that all Dr. Pierce's skill and experience, all the medical ability of his staff, and the advisory resources of his great hospital, for such the Invalid's Hotel and Surgical Institute at Buffalo, N. Y., really is—all these are at your service, absolutely free, without fee or charge of any kind. Write to Dr. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y., and you will take the first step to health.

Let no dealer foist on you any other medicine as "just as good" as Dr. Pierce's. Nothing is just as good as "Golden Medical Discovery," which has not that medicine's record of marvelous cures, and no other medicine can show even a shadow of such success in saving life as marks the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery.

THE PATH OF LIFE

is full of pitfalls, into which the ignorant and unwary ceaselessly stumble, to the peril of health and happiness. Dr. Pierce, in his Common Sense Medical Adviser, has done for this unknown land what the explorer has done for the dark continent—mapped it and marked it, and shown how to walk it in safety. THE BETSY SILVER MINE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY LOUISE J. STRONG.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

"GIRLS, a letter has come from Uncle Billy. Come in and hear what he says."

"Can't it wait?" Beth asked. "We're just deciding where to plant the peas and I'm sure nothing in the letter can be so important as that."

"I think you'll change your mind when you hear what he says," Mrs. Raymond answered.

The girls flocked into the sitting-room.

"Well, what is it; has he declared war?" Beth asked, sitting down by her father's chair.

"Worse than that," he answered, "he has planned a robbery."

Beth laughed. "It's little he'll find to rob us of," she declared, "unless it might be one of the boys."

"Or one of the girls," he said.

"Oh!" she exclaimed in sudden comprehension.

They looked inquiringly at each other when the letter had been read, but seemed in no haste to speak.

"He seems to think it easy for you to give away a child," Beth said at length. She was usually spokesman.

"But my dear it is only for a long visit," her mother replied.

"And maybe he will do something for the boys if he is pleased with the one who goes," suggested Mary.

"With me you mean," said Beth.

"And why you?" asked her father.

"Of course I must go," Beth asserted. "If Mary left her school the house would fall, and Lois is frightened at the bare idea; then she is such a good nurse you could not spare her."

"I don't know how to spare any of you, but brother Billy has never written so kindly and it would be best perhaps for one of you to go," her mother said.

"If I could be well and able to provide as I ought—" Mr. Raymond began.

Beth interrupted him. "After all it's only for a visit, papa; and I ought to be glad to go. I am good for nothing here."

"Beth!" remonstrated her mother.

"It is true, mamma; you can never make a teacher of me, even Mary has given up hope of that and my music doesn't pay enough to keep me," Beth answered.

"We'll all have the blues," muttered Martin, who had been an interested listener, "and I bet if Uncle Billy gets you out there he'll never let you come back again."

Beth dashed her hand across her eyes and laughed. "You needn't think that, Martin; I guess if I tried hard I could be so disagreeable that he would be glad to get rid of me. And I'll write such letters home! Tommy Dauddles' stationery will be of some use now."

"It's too bad of you Beth to speak so of Professor Newell," Mary protested. "I am afraid he will feel dreadfully about your going away."

Beth looked conscious and her cheeks grew pink, but the other boys came in and she was spared further discussion of Professor Newell's feelings.

Uncle Billy had sent a check for expenses and Beth departed in good spirits, "leaving a vacancy at home much too large for a girl of her size," as her brother Austin put it. At the end of her journey she was met by a large man whom she recognized as Uncle Billy by his resemblance to the old picture of him at home.

"Well, and which one is it?" he asked.

"I'm the second girl, Elizabeth," Beth said stiffly. He ought to have remembered that; they had told him which one was coming.

"Oh, it's Betsy is it?" he said.

"They call me Beth at home."

"Betsy was good enough for your grandmother, and ought to be good enough for you."

"It's too good. I'll have to grow to it," said Beth. "Suppose you call me Elizabeth if you don't like my home name."

"No, Betsy'll do," he insisted. "You said you were the second girl, how many are there?"

"You mean all of us?" she asked.

He nodded and Beth, delighted to talk of the family, gave him a biography of them all from the least to the greatest.

"Your father's sick a good deal, isn't he?" he asked when she had finished.

"Yes," said Beth regretfully, "and he has been worse than usual this last winter, but he is getting better now."

"He has no business with so many of you," Uncle Billy said a little roughly.

"He couldn't very well kill any of us," Beth answered demurely.

"Well, no, I suppose not," he admitted, glancing at her with a twinkle in his eye.

Before she had been there two weeks they were fast friends, and at the end of a month Uncle Billy was wondering how he was ever going to let her go home again. She learned to ride and developed such skill in managing her horse and caring for herself that she was allowed to roam unattended over mountain and plain.

She came in one evening much excited. "Uncle Billy," she cried, "did you know there was a silver mine about here somewhere?"

"I know the greasers say so."

"And don't you believe it?"

"Oh, I expect they used to dig out a little silver in the mountains here, but nothing to pay."

"I'm going to find it," she declared.

"Well, if you do you may have it," he said.

"Do you mean it Uncle Billy, really and truly?"

"Really and truly, and I don't go back on my word," but he laughed so heartily that she went to her room offended.

From that day she had a purpose in the wanderings, and went to work systematically to learn all that was possible about the silver mine. She rode miles to interview those who knew the country best; she talked with every greaser and Indian that she came across, and succeeded in locating its probable whereabouts within certain limits which she determined to search thoroughly. Being Beth, she could not keep all this from the folks at home and her glowing letters so fired the boys' imaginations that the two oldest seriously contemplated undertaking the journey on foot that they might help her. The older heads foreseeing probable disappointment, advised her to be prepared for it, and cautioned her anxiously against losing herself in the mountains or being carried away by wild animals, at which Beth laughed a little, saying to Uncle Billy:

"They think there is a mountain lion behind every rock, and as for disappointment poor papa and mamma think there is nothing else to be looked for in life, they have had so much of it. And if I succeed they shall come out here, and papa will get well."

The cautions set Uncle Billy thinking, and after that he required that she leave plain directions as to where she was going to search each day when she set out. He did not dare laugh at her notion now but was planning something as an offset for the disappointment he, too, thought inevitable, which would have sent her into raptures of delight had she paid attention to what was going on. But she was absorbed in her prospecting and spent most of her time roaming over the mountains on her pony.

Riding along one day she was startled at hearing a ringing tenor voice trolling a gay song and she listened in surprise. "It sounds like—but it can't be," she thought.

A horseman appeared around a point, the song stopped at sight of her and the singer came up with outstretched hands, and eyes of wistful tenderness.

"Tommy Da——! or—I mean—Professor Newell!" she stammered, growing very red.

"Yes," he said, smiling, "Tommy Dauddles or Professor Newell, whichever you please. They told me at the house I would find you out this way, they thought."

"I am ashamed of myself for picking up the boy's nonsense," she apologized. "How did you come here?"

"The usual way," he replied.

"How did you know where I was? I told them——" She paused.

"Not to tell me," he finished cheerfully. "Yes, I know but I bribed Martie."

"And then followed me," she said.

"Oh, I've been out here before, though I didn't know Mr. Wilson was your uncle. I've spent two vacations up at my friend Burton's ranch."

"I didn't know," Beth faltered, covered with confusion at having taken too much for granted.

"I don't mind telling you, though," he went on, "that I shouldn't have come out here this summer if you hadn't been here, Beth."

"How like home it is to see you!" she exclaimed. "I believe I am a little homesick, but I shall not go home very soon if I am."

"Why, are you so fond of the mountains?" he asked.

"I love them," she replied, "but that isn't the reason. I'm going to stay till I—but you will laugh at me."

"I never laugh at you," he protested. "Tell me."

"They say there is a silver mine here somewhere, and I am going to find it. Uncle Billy laughs but says if I find it I can have it."

"They hoped at home that you would go back with me at the end of my vacation, and so did I Beth."

"Of course you don't believe in the silver mine either," she said disregarding this.

"Oh, the report may be true. All the Mexicans tell of it, but it has been lost so long that no one knows much about it. I hope you won't set your heart on it," he said earnestly.

"I have set my heart on it," she declared, "and I am not going to give it up."

"Then you must let me help you."

"No, I will not have your help," she answered.

And no urging of his could change her decision, but he managed to see a good deal of her nevertheless, for Uncle Billy had a great liking for him and was always urging him to stay with them.

"And he dawdles around after me just as he used to," Beth wrote complainingly to Mary.

And Mary answered, "You are unreasonable Beth, I don't believe you know your own mind. You will never find a better man nor one who cares for you as he does."

"No, I am not unreasonable," Beth whispered to herself, reading Mary's words. "I know very well what he is and how much he—" she broke off, pressing her hands to her hot cheeks, "but I know too that he has nothing but his profession, and we are poor as poverty, and 'a man takes a heavy load upon himself who marries into such a large family,' as Granny White says. He shall not do it."

So Professor Newell's vacation was drawing to a close and matters were still on their old footing except that Uncle Billy openly espoused his cause, but without helping him in the least.

"You didn't see Beth I suppose or you would have brought her home," Aunt Martha said to him one afternoon when he arrived as usual.

Professor Newell looked anxious. "She is generally in before this isn't she?" he asked.

There was a commotion outside; Uncle Billy rushed to the door. "Betsy's pony has come in without her," he cried.

Aunt Martha wrung her hands, Professor Newell with a white face sprang for his horse. Uncle Billy followed hallooing to every man in sight or sound, and soon a cavalcade was galloping towards the mountains.

They grew very anxious as the hours passed and darkness was closing in and no trace of her had been found. The men scattered out, covering as much ground as possible, shouting at intervals and listening, hoping for a reply, their torches flashing like beacon lights. At last there came an answering cry.

"Thank heaven she is alive," the professor exclaimed tearing over the bowlders like mad.

"Oh, Tom, Tom!" a voice wailed.

"Beth darling, where are you?" he cried.

"Here," she answered almost at his feet. "Is it really you Tom? Be careful."

But she was too late, the professor plunging ahead recklessly felt the ground give way beneath him, and dropped into a black pit.

"You should have stayed at the top and pulled me out." Beth said with a hysterical giggle. "I was never so glad to see any one in my life."

"Oh, Beth my darling are you safe?" clasping her close.

"I seem to be safe now at least, but my arm is sprained," she replied.

"For one awful moment I feared I should crush you in falling. I am going to take you straight home Beth."

"We'll get out first won't we?" she said saucily.

Uncle Billy was fuming at the top and calling upon everybody to witness that once he laid hands on her Betsy should never again expose herself to such an accident.

"Fasten the rope about her, Newell, and send her up," he cried.

"Uncle Billy I want a torch down here," Beth said.

"Come out of that!" he commanded.

"I won't! I believe I have found it and I won't stir until we see."

In another instant Uncle Billy had thrust the rope into the hands of the men and swung himself down.

"You little jade!" he said, but there were tears in his eyes as he picked her up and kissed her.

The torches disclosed an excavation in the side of the mountain, and Uncle Billy after examining it keenly a few moments called: "Come down here Morris won't you? I believe she has run it down at last."

Morris had had experience and at once decided that she had really found the silver mine, at which the men set up a hurrah. Beth was wild with joy, and made them tie a handkerchief to a stout stake and plant it firmly by the pit, for fear they could not otherwise find it.

"I've looked at hundreds of places that seemed just like this from below but when I got up here and saw that hole I felt sure I had found it and then I tried to see what was down there and fell in."

"And wasn't you scared?" asked Uncle Billy.

"I was a little afraid of snakes, and a good deal afraid that you might never find me, and my left arm was helpless and I couldn't climb out."

"Why Newell and I would have torn down the mountains before we'd given you up," he said.

A thorough examination next morning showed indications that warranted an immediate opening of the mine. Uncle Billy promptly named it the "Betsy Silver Mine," declaring that Beth had earned it and it belonged to her, and later the family received this jubilant message; "Found! Get ready to come out here immediately; all of you. Particulars by letter."

Beth's arm was very painful but the doctor who had been hastily summoned pronounced it only a severe sprain which would soon recover.

After the mine had been talked over and settled to every one's satisfaction Uncle Billy asked:

"Did you think I would let you go back home Betsy if you had failed?"

"Why of course I would have gone home again," she answered decidedly.

"What do you think I am doing with all that building stuff out there by the grove?"

"Why, I never thought of it. Putting up a house I suppose," she replied.

"Yes, but what do you think I am building for?"

"I don't know," she said slowly. "Oh, Uncle Billy do you mean—but you can't mean that you were going to do that," she cried.

"Yes I do. I have been fixing to bring them all out here. I guess I've never been quite fair to your father; I had my mind made up that your mother should marry some one else, and I've never had much to do with them. He'll get well out here and with the boys can run a ranch of his own," he explained.

"Oh, you blessed Uncle Billy!" and she threw her sound arm around his neck. "And if I hadn't found the mine it would have been all right."

"It would have been all right," he repeated. "I suppose Professor Newell will remain of course. Your husband will be the best business manager you can get," he added mischievously.

And Beth turned a blushing, radiant face to the professor, but he did not object.

A DAY OF TROUBLE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY HELEN M. WINSLOW.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

AY, Philury," says my pardner one day last summer when he come in from mendin' the fence. "Le's give a garden party."

"A garden party," says I, "What's that?"

"Wal,—er—it's what all the fashionables give. I heerd over to Freetown the other day that Senator Hart's folks wuz goin' to give one, an' the postmaster said everybody as is anybody nowdays gives 'em. And By Gum," says Joshua, waxing profane, "If Jim Hart has got so awful stylish thet he c'n give garden parties, I can."

"It's that new wife he married down in Washington," says I, "not Jim Hart thet does it. Jim Hart ain't a person to put on style, if he is a senator. But they dew say thet new wife of his'n leads him a rig. But I dunno 's thet's any reason why we need to make fools of ourselves."

"Now thet's alwuz the way with a woman," says my pardner, his dander on the rise. "Let them get hold of a new-fangled idee fust an' they'll raise the roof to kerry it out; but let the man, the head of the house an' their rightful lord," here he swelled himself out and took on an important air, "propose one an' they want to throw cold water all over it."

"Joshua," says I in my most conciliatin' tones, for I see we were on the aidge of a fam'ly jar an' in immediate danger of fallin'. "You know I ain't slow to fall in with new idees; but I dew hate tew see the pardner of my life joys an' sorrers made a laffin'stock of. The town of Pottsville ain't used to garden parties. They'd shy at 'em like a colt at a wheelbarrow; an' how'd you feel ef you went to the expense of gittin' up a thing thet nobody'd come tew? Besides, what be they? garden parties, I mean."

"Wal, I see a whole lot of folks out on Hart's lawn and in his grounds, all dressed up tew kill; they had a table set under a tent and had ice cream an' lemonade, etsettery; an' ez fur 's I c'd see everybody wuz enjoyin' themselves fust rate."

"O, a picnic on his own grounds," I said. "Well I don't think it's polite to ask folks to see you an' make 'em stay outdoors an' eat their own vittles. I put my foot down agin picnics."

"I tell you it ain't a picnic," snapped Joshua again. I see he was gettin' wrathy again an' made haste to mollify him. "Is the' anything you would 'specially like to hev cooked for supper?"

"Hot biscuits an' honey would go well," he said. (He can always forget a grievance when good things to eat are round). But as he went out of the shed I heerd him mutter:

"Durn a woman, anyway."

The next day he came back from the post-office all wrought up again an' talked about garden parties till out o' sheer weariness of the subject I told him to go ahead an' get up his garden party to suit himself.

Now the trials I endured with that man gettin' up that party decidin' who to ask, how to ask 'em, what to give 'em to eat (for I put my foot down ag'n their bringin' their own vittles to my house first off), whether to set one table or a dozen little ones, where to raise a tent, whether he should wear his linen pants or his alapaccy ones, an' etsettery, would fill a volume, and I ain't writin' a book. But the day finally dawned and rolled along into a hot afternoon. It was in the middle of August and Natur' done her prettiest for us, except thet Old Sol (I've seen him called so in books, meanin' the sun), was a leetle too warm in his attentions; in fact, it was pipin' hot. Joshua hed asked about everybody connected with the Methodist church, in which he'd been a pillar for thirty years, an' didn't want to hurt anybody by slightin' them. They begun to come about two o'clock, tho' I heerd afterwards thet garden parties, when done real stylish, don't begin till about five. Prob'ly a hundred folks come in all, an' I don't believe one of those shook hands with me an' Joshua without sayin:'

"Well, how-dye-do? thought I'd come early so's to see what a garden party is like, anyway."

An' every one of 'em declared before the day was over thet it was nothin' more 'n a picnic where they didn't furnish the vittles. An' I noticed none of 'em didn't shed tears over that part of it, an' all went home sayin' they'd had an elegant time. Which I persoom they did, fer my cookin' stands high in Pottsville an' I laid myself out on that party.

I had a good enough time, but Joshua won't give no more garden parties; he said so that night when we finally tied on our nightcaps over two as tired heads as ever laid down to rest.

In the first place, he had felt pretty frisky for a man of sixty. He got the young folks to playin' crokay early an' they seemed to be havin' a real good time until Mis' Brown come, bringin' with her Emmeline and a young man from Boston with red hair an' glasses, who spoke in a languishin' way an' put up an eye-glass every time he was introduced to a young girl, sayin' "How-de-do" in a die-away, hold-me-up way thet made me want to shake him.

Joshua asked him if he wouldn't like to play crokay and handed him a mallet; but the young feller only looked at it thro' his eye-glass and said:

"Well, really now, don't ye know, I don't know how to play these antiquated games. Haven't you a golf course?"

His tone more than anything else madded Joshua, and he said:

"No, young man, I hain't; an' if I had I wouldn't let you have it." He was going on to say more, but I pulled his coattail and made him stop. Nothin' makes Joshua so mad, as a dude; it is like wavin' a red rag to a bull.

But the young man didn't seem to sense his danger, and kep' a talkin' to my pardner. He asked him when a horse moulted; when a pig ceased to be a pig and became a hog; which cow gave sour milk, and if he ever put up hay-seed for the market.

"Why," says he, "I understand there's places where you could get fifty cents a pound fer your whisker-trimmin's."

Joshua ain't a fool, if I do say it as shouldn't. He knewt the young feller was a-tryin' to guy him, and he set out to git even with him.

"Come right down this way," says he to the feller in a tone so cordial I knew at once there was guile in his heart. "The cow that gives sour milk is in the barn jest this minute, lucky you spoke. I alwuz love to 'commodate you city fellers in any little way I can."

The young man didn't mistrust anything, but winking to Emmeline (I see him do it on the sly), he stepped off with the greatest alacrity. Meanwhile some of the men, deacons and elders and brethren high in class-meeting, caught on to what was goin' on and they follored along towards the barn. It was all I could do to keep the women folks engaged in conversation so's 't they wouldn't hear. Joshua told me of it afterwards.

"I wuz boun' to git even with the loon," says he; "so I took him down and showed him a bed of smartweed. 'There,' says I, 'I notice you hev trouble with your eyes. If you would give 'em a good rubbin' with some o' this 'ere weed things would look different to ye. Even hay-seed would be easier told from some other things.' I didn't think he'd be such a greeny, but he up an' grabbed a big bunch o' smart-weed an' rubbed it well against his eye. It wasn't but a minute before he began to yell. But I paid no 'tention to him; an' pretty soon I ushered him into the shed that red cow that I took her calf from is. No sooner did she catch sight of that flamin' red tie o' his with floatin' ends than she lit out for him and in less time than I can tell it in, she give him a boost that landed him straddle the fence. A sca'tter feller you never see. He fairly shivered. 'Would you like to see more?' I said. 'I've got a nice cosset sheep out here I'd like to interduce ye to ef you'd like to meet any more curiosities on this farm. Then there's a sow in the orchard, if you want—' But before I could finish, he broke loose an' the way he scooted for the house an' Emmeline was a caution."

That was when I see him come racing across the lawn like a madman an' straight for Mrs. Brown an' Emmeline.

"I p'otest," he cried. "I'm insulted at every turn. I shall go home. Such barbawity weally I never saw."

At this Mis' Brown she fired up.

"Joshua Winterbottom, I'm ashamed of you," says she. "I am going home. If this is one of your new-fangled garden parties I'll have none of 'em. Come Emmeline, come Mr. Emerson-Clark." And off they sailed, in spite of all I could do or say. As for Joshua, he would't do or say anything to hinder.

Of course, the men all laughed and tee-heed and called it a great joke. I've noticed sensible men, as a rule, haint no great sympathy with a dude. But I was pizen sick of the whole performance. Besides I knew jest how Mis' Brown would go away an' talk about our garden party.

Things went on pretty well until time to serve the supper. I had laid myself out on that supper and all would hev gone well if Joshua hadn't insisted on helpin' pass things. There was plenty of young and pretty girls to do it; but in spite of that, or perhaps because of it, he wouldn't keep away from the kitchen.

He passed a plate o' sandwiches without any mishap an' I headed him off 'n the coffee an' cream. It was when we come to the ice cream an' cake that we see trouble. I dished it out an' give it to Luella Clarke and Juliette Babbitt to carry round on little trays covered with my newest embroidered cloths; but no sooner did they git started out than Joshua, who was gittin' excited the tireder he got, grabbed a fresh platter of cream that I had just turned out to cut an' off he went, passin' it for a second helpin'. That would have been all right but when he got out to the garden seat he tripped his toe and over he went, spillin' the cream all over him an' fallin' into it so's to completely ruin his alapaccy coat an' pants that he'd finally put on for the occasion. I had to put 'em into the tub an' give 'em a regular scrubbin' an' they shrunk so's't they are too short in the arms an' legs, makin' him look like a school boy; but I tell him they are too good to throw away or make carpet-rags of, so he'll have to wear 'em out.

But that ain't all; he turned his ankle, and as is always the way with a man, he begun to yell with the pain.

"Philura," he howled, "come here, I'm almost killed. My leg's broke, an' all because you would make me pass things."

"Hush, hush," says I. "You set up an' keep still; I'll fetch the arnicky an' you try to be a man."

At this he quieted down a little, but he had to have the rockin' chair from the settin'-room fetched out an' his ankle had to be rubbed, an' meanwhile Mis' Perkins an' the girls had to see about the rest of the supper an' pickin' up the dishes an' washin' 'em. For a injured husband, that is if he ain't much damaged, is about all one woman wants to 'tend to. I thought the folks never would git cleared out; some had to stay to slick up the house and grounds a little for me, and some had to do Joshua's chores; but finally, about half past nine, the last one shut the gate and went away.

"Wal, Philura," says my partner, "I hope you're satisfied now. But you needn't never ast me again to give a garden-party nor a lawn-party neither, fer I won't."

And rememberin' his damaged condition I held my tongue.

AN UNSAVORY DISH.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY RUPE BARNBY.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

As one journeys toward the headwaters of the Mackenzie river, through the dense growths of primitive forest which close in upon him more and more ominously as he advances, he will find himself looking ever more expectantly, as he goes, for the little clearings in the woods that mark the locations of the trading posts along the route.

These last vestiges of civilization occur at regular intervals along the way, like a long series of stepping stones leading from civilized society into the heart of the wilderness; and to the traveler, wearied with a long day's march, they are indeed welcome sights, presaging refreshment, rest and good cheer.

Not far from the junction of the Coldwater Branch and the upper Mackenzie, is the station well known among all the hunters and traders of this vast wilderness region as "Uncle Ben's" from the fact that old Ben Washburne, a famous trapper in his day, has for years had charge of the post and all that goes on within it.

And it is not to be wondered at that "Uncle Ben's" has such a wide reputation among the woodsmen of upper Canada, for well the swarthy trapper deserves all the praise and commendation which are his. Never was there a tidier or neater home among the most fastidious of our city dwellers than are the station buildings under Uncle Ben's care, plain structures of rough hewn logs though they be. And as for Washburne's tins and china, many a neat New England housewife would open her eyes wide in astonishment with a glimpse at their polished cleanliness.

But it is in his culinary skill that Uncle Ben has won the greater part of his renown, and there are those who confidently assert, not without reason I must admit, that his cooking, all in all, is practically faultless. What roasts of vension and steaming hot rolls, delicious coffee and Canadian pancakes done to a turn I have eaten within the unpretentious walls of that wilderness trading post! It makes my mouth water, even now, just to think of it!

Some years ago, after a long day's tramp in the company of my guide, Joe Bentley, we arrived late in the day, tired and hungry, at Uncle Ben's. Ah, what a feast he spread before us! Such dainties one would hardly expect to find in the depths of the woods. What inroads we made into the viands placed before us, too, as Uncle Ben looked good naturedly on, justly proud of our appreciation of his skill!

One dish in particular I was surprised to see on this woodland table, and ate with good relish, tripe. But I noticed that my companion never as much as touched it, excellently prepared though it was.

"Joe," I remonstrated at last, "why don't you eat some of this tripe? You'll not have such a chance again in many a day."

"I know it," said he, amid his struggles with a huge slice of venison, "but it's an unsavory dish with me, and if you want to know why, I don't mind tellin' you, bimeby."

As we sat before the roaring fire, that night, enjoying our pipes in the firelight, Joe told me his reasons at full length, as follows:

"When I became of age, I decided to adopt woodcraft as my calling, and apprenticed myself to an old woodsman named Bushard. He knew his business well, was a good shot with the rifle, and understood wild varmints and all their curious ways. Not a winter passed without finding us with a good supply of pelts on hand as the result of the season's work, which meant of course plenty of money in our pockets in the spring.

"Take it all in all, Bushard was good company in the woods, his only fault being that he was rather inclined to be silent. Once in a while, however, he grew quite talkative about the campfire, and such times would even go to the extent, now and then, of relating some of his experiences. One incident in particular he seemed especially fond of relating, and told it to me a dozen times, at least. It was this:

"'I once had a pard by the name of Baldy. What his real name was I can't say, because he was never known among us trappers as anybody else but just Baldy, and the reason was that as sure as I'm sitting here, he hadn't a spear of hair on his head not one.

"'Baldy always went through the woods bareheaded, because he was proud of his pate, the boys used to say jokingly, but in reality, in my opinion, because he lived in the hope that exposure to all kinds of weather might in time bring out another crop of hair on his head again; but if so, he must have been sorely disappointed, for it never came.

"'On the contrary, something ten times worse happened. One day as we were picking our way through a thick spruce swamp near the base of a long range of high hills, Baldy without a cap as usual, all to onct at the upturned roots of an overthrown hemlock, we found ourselves face to face with as big a grizzly bear as I ever saw in my life. Whew! but he was a whopper! You don't see none such nowadays.

"'Well, Baldy was a little in advance, with his rifle over his shoulder, going rather careless like, and almost before he knew what had happened, that surly bear had up and jumped upon him, and seized his uncovered, unprotected head right between his great jaws. Seeing the danger which my pard was in, I fired instantly, and throwing aside my gun, dashed upon the beast with my drawn knife.

"'The struggle was an awful one while it lasted, but was soon over, and the huge carcass of the forest monster lay lifeless at my feet. I had acted as quick as mortal man could move, and in the nick of time to save my companion from death; but not, alas, from serious injury. When at last I succeeded in extricating the poor, bleeding fellow from the vice like grip of the savage bear, I found him still alive, but the great tusks of the grizzly's heavy jaw had torn away his scalp from ear to forehead.

"'Ah, but Baldy showed himself then a man to the core. In spite of his awful suffering he never flinched once while I bound up his wounds as best I could. Not a groan or complaint escaped him, but picking up the bit of skin torn from his head, he put it in his pocket with a laugh, remarking that after all, it was but a small loss, one which he above all others could best afford, and, poor fellow, I guess he was right.

"'In a wonderfully short time Baldy was well and around again, practically as good as ever; but what do you think he did with his scalp? Why, he put it in a bottle of alcohol and gave it to a friend of his as a memento to remember him by! Baldy's dead and gone, long ago, but I have good reason to know that that friend of his still has his memento, which he carefully preserves; and that's all that there is left of Baldy, now, poor fellow.'

"I served an apprenticeship of five years with Bushard, and every one of those five seasons we got on finely together, with no ill luck attending us until the very last. But on our last trip home from our trapping grounds, as we came back laden with furs and highly elated over our good luck, in some unaccountable manner, just how I was never quite able to understand, we became confused and lost our way.

"Now it so happened that we were scant of provisions that year, and for that reason had set out for home considerably earlier than usual. We had remained at our trapping, however, as long as we felt it safe to venture under the circumstances, reluctant to leave until it was absolutely necessary; and from this cause it came about that the amount of provender we held back for our homeward journey was barely sufficient to carry us home on a pinch, and a tight one at that.

"To be lost in the woods, fifty miles and more from any human habitation, is bad enough under any circumstances, but with provisions out and little or no prospect of securing sustenance from any other source, the outlook may well be termed disheartening. Day and night we plunged ahead through bogs and swamps and over ancient windfalls in the hope of striking the Mackenzie, scarcely stopping for any rest or refreshment at all and half crazed with desperation.

"I never saw the woods so silent and deserted as they were just at that time. Not a bird or beast of any kind could be brought to bag with the rifle, and our supplies were soon out altogether. We then took to eating roots and twigs, even chewing our leather belts and portions of our moccasins, but our strength was gradually failing us, and well we knew that if the river was not reached soon, we should perish.

"Realization of our danger spurred us on for a time, but at last I gave out, being younger and less inured to hardship, and sinking upon the ground declared that I could not move another step. Nothing that my companion could say could arouse me to renewed efforts. In vain he pleaded, commanded, threatened. I could only beg for nourishment in husky tones: 'haven't you a thing to eat about you, not even a bit of meal in the corner of your knapsack?'

"Suddenly Bushard's face brightened. 'Yes, come to think of it, I have just the thing, a little bottle of pickled restorative which I carry for just such an occasion as this! Here! take it and eat it! No, I don't want any of it, you can have it all.'

"It was like a bit of yonder tripe, but thoroughly impregnated with whiskey, and so revived me that I was soon able to rise and push ahead again. At last we reached the river and soon after a trading post, but so thoroughly exhausted were we that it was weeks before we were strong enough to continue on again.

"'Bushard,' I said to my companion one day during our protracted stay at the post, 'that was quite a remedy for exhaustion you had in your knapsack, well worth having by a fellow in case of accident; what was it, anyway?'

"For a minute and more he looked me full in the face and then replied: 'I told you, you know, that I was the only real friend poor old Baldy ever had,' and not another word could I get out of him.

"Well, it was weeks before it dawned upon me what Bushard meant. But don't you see, that 'ere restorative was that memento! Baldy's bottled scalp which he had carried in his knapsack thirty years and more!"

Men, Women and Things.

CONDUCTED BY JENNIE MELVENE DAVIS.

The richest woman in the world lives under a fictitious name in a meager little flat in Hoboken, New Jersey. Hetty Green means to take care of her millions and to save herself from the annoyance of begging letters. Mrs. Green is sixty-five years of age but she has far more energy and animation than many a younger woman. She has been called eccentric, but her type is found in many a small village and it is her wealth rather than her peculiar ways that have made Hetty Green prominent. She manages her own business to a very large degree. Her dealings with lawyers usually end in a quarrel and she has been engaged in almost constant litigation. "Three things I detest" says this outspoken woman, "lawyers, tax collectors and beggars. I'll admit there may be some good lawyers but the people will be better off soon as they are all done away with." Mrs. Green is a shrewd business woman and has a genius for finance. She claims descent from Governor Rogers of Connecticut and says there have been many millionaires in her family. She learned business methods when a young woman by assisting her father in the management of his estates. She married at the age of thirty but Mr. Green is rather a silent partner in the family. There are two children. The daughter is an attractive young woman and will inherit a fortune from both her mother and her aunt. The father is a member of several clubs in New York but Mrs. Green has never made any social effort. The busy world of down town New York knows Hetty Green well and fears her but to Society she is utterly unknown.

Elbert Hubbard is the Philistine whose sayings and doings have amused the country and inspired the town of East Aurora, New York. He publishes the Philistine, a periodical of protest and brown paper. Mr. Hubbard's personality is as unique as his magazine. As he writes the most of the magazine each month his opinions have been widely read. He hails from the State of Illinois and has brought something of the spirit of his native state to the little town that he has made well known. Mr. Hubbard was and is a practical stock breeder. He has also written a number of books. Little Journeys to the Homes of Great and Good Men, two or three novels, many essays and a historical novel Time and Chance, which tells the story of John Brown. He published a short sermon in the Philistine called "A Message to Garcia." This has been widely read. The New York Central Railroad had thousands of copies printed for free distribution after it had placed a copy in the hands of each employee of the road. Sermons were preached in the pulpit in this practical preachment of the East Aurora publisher. Mr. Hubbard's best work has been that of practical philanthropy instead of acrid protest. He has established at East Aurora an artistic book bindery known as the Reycroft Press. The best and most artistic work on this line is done here by country boys and girls. A book binder was imported from Germany and he gave lessons in the art of binding by hand. Now the Reycroft Press turns out one hundred dollar editions of Shakespeare's sonnets, exquisite books in flexible leather covers with satin linings, books printed on real vellum and many other illustrations of all that is beautiful, artistic and expensive. The workers in the shop are paid good wages and share profits; they have a fifteen minute recess in the morning, an hour at noon and all of Saturday afternoon. The work shop is a club room where baths and a piano may be used. Mr. Hubbard works about the shop in bicycle breeches and flannel shirt. His piercing black eyes see everything but he never commands—only encourages and advises. His work is changing the whole life of the little town—hand labor has its old recognition as one of the hightest means of expressing personality. It is a bit of old Europe reproduced in America and fulfilling the practical and the poetical. Mr. Hubbard's success is as unique as the man.

The name "F. Opper" signed to a caricature is a promise of fun. For twenty years his name has been a synonym for fun, wit and humor. His sketches and caricatures have kept all America laughing and his fertile brain seems far from being exhausted. Mr. Opper was born in Ohio in 1857. From his earliest years he wished to be an artist but when he left school at the age of fourteen it was to take a position in a village store. Then he became a printer's devil and soon rose to be type-setter. Then he drifted to New York where he finally accepted employment in a store. He exercised his artistic ability by illustrating window cards advertising some special line of goods. All his leisure hours were spent in sketching and the comic vein was prominent. These rough sketches were taken from one newspaper to another and finally some were accepted. Then Mr. Opper left the store and finally accepted a salaried position with "Leslie." Three years later he became a member of the staff of Puck and remained with that paper for nearly eighteen years. His success and that of the paper are inseparable. Last spring he become one of the staff of the New York Journal. Mr. Opper makes sketches of people, scenery and events and then works out his ideas by himself. He says that he reads the newspapers and follows current events and his caricatures suggest themselves to him. The man who has made millions laugh has certainly given a substantial contribution to the world's welfare. His caricatures have furnished endless merriment but they have had and do have a most important political effect.

The heads of great libraries are coming to be recognized more and more as powerful factors in the intellectual life of the nation. The new librarian of Columbia University is Dr. James Huline Canfield who resigned the presidency of Ohio State University to accept this position. Dr. Canfield is well known both in the east and the west. He is a man of great personal magnetism and an orator of no mean power. He has had a varied experience in the educational world from the time of his graduation from Williams College in 1868 until the present time. The first twenty years of his life were spent in Brooklyn, where his father is a well-known clergyman. His early education was at the Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute. He entered the educational field as Superintendent of the schools of St. Joseph, Missouri. He next went to the University of Kansas where he filled the chairs of history, literature and political science successively until the year 1891. The Ohio State University then called him and under his successful administration the school doubled in numbers. The income was vastly increased and many new buildings were added. Dr. Canfield has been called an educational expansionist. It is believed that he will co-operate with Dr. Billings the head of the Public Library in New York in making the library facilities of the city worthy of the greatest city of the greatest nation on earth.

Few subjects have been of greater interest than the great international cup races for the coveted cup that America has held since the "fifties." The captains of the racing yachts are a powerful factor in success. The cup defender Columbia was sailed by a man who comes of a family of yachtsmen. Not the kind of yachtsmen who own steam yachts but the kind who build boats and sail them. The Barr family are known to all the yachting men in the country. They are Scotch and the father of the Columbia's captain built and sailed boats and small yachts on the Clyde. His sons and grandsons have followed the sea. His son John Barr is a famous prize winner and his grandson who is twenty-seven, commands the Shona. Captain Charles Barr, the Columbia's captain, was born in Scotland in 1864. He spent much of his early life in school and even studied law but the scent of the salt was in his nostrils and before he was twenty he had turned his back on scholastic things and shipped under his brother as a common hand. He rose to the command and has been captain of the Wasp the Gloriana, and the Navajo. He has also sailed the Vigilant and the Colonia. He is in charge of the Colonia at present but was allowed to take command of the Columbia to defend the cup. All his racing experience has been in American waters and he is now a naturalized citizen of the United States.

The war in the Transvaal emphasizes the fact that the Peace Conference last summer at The Hague was more poetical than practical in its results. At the same time it makes the personality of the man whose work suggested the Conference of more than ordinary interest. Baron Johann von Block is a Russian official of high rank. He gave eight years of hard and exhaustive study to modern conditions of warfare and the result was "The War of the Future" a book in six volumes. It was owing to the powerful effect of this book upon the mind of the Czar of Russia that the call for disarmament was issued. The book itself does not appeal directly for the abolition of war. It gives a powerfully graphic picture of the result, the miseries and horrors of conflict are so vividly portrayed that the conclusion that war must not be tolerated is forced upon the reader. The statement that a war between the nations of the Dual and Triple Alliance would put 15,000,000 men in the field with a daily expense of $20,000,000 sets even political economists to counting the cost of war. It is a practical estimate of war from the side of the expert in destructive weapons, the political economists and the humanitarian. Baron von Block is no visionary nor dreamer but from his earliest years he has had a horror of war. He is sixty-five years old but his piercing eyes and quick energetic movements make him seem much younger. He is quick in manner except when he becomes excited in a discussion on his favorite topic, the barbarity of war. Then he is fierce and forceful. He speaks English fairly well and also uses eight or nine other languages. He was a prominent figure at the Peace Conference. It must have been very gratifying to him to meet the ablest men of all nations gathered to discuss the question of a universal peace. In spite of war and rumors of war the Peace Conference marked an epoch in civilization and Baron Von Block was the strongest factor in bringing about that result.

From a ranch in far away Australia comes the leading soprano singer of the world—Melba. November brought the season of grand opera to New York and chief in the galaxy of stars was the woman who was Nellie Mitchell. The Australian nightingale is today the greatest prima donna of the times and she owes it all to her own indomitable energy and perseverance. She spent the greater part of her childhood on her father's ranches in the Australian wilderness. A small part of each year was spent in Melbourne and from that city the great singer takes her stage name. She comes of a musical family, her father having a very fine baritone voice. She did her share of the housework and washed and wiped dishes or did any other tasks within her childish power. She taught herself to play on the piano and later had instruction in Melbourne. She tells of her sorrow when they were forced to leave town and return to the ranch and she was deprived of her piano. Her father pacified her by furnishing a concertina. When the traveling minister came Melba assisted at services by playing on her concertina. At this time it was her ambition to become a great pianist but her father disapproved of her adopting music as a profession. Her first public appearance was made at a concert given in the town hall by some children. Melba sang the "Last Rose of Summer," and "Coming thro' the Rye." She continued to study music in a desultory way and learned to play the pipe organ among other instruments. She was married at the early age of seventeen. Her determination to pursue a musical career gradually developed. She began to sing in public and finally was urged by friends to study in Europe. At last she found herself in Paris. The shy awkward girl from the Australian wilds applied for tuition to the celebrated voice teacher Madame Marchesi. Frightened and almost fainting she stood up to sing before the great critic who will not instruct pupils that do not show great ability. When Melba had finished her song, the celebrated teacher took both of her hands and assured the Australian girl that she would one day be her greatest pupil. Melba was poor and for two years she worked almost night and day to prepare for her debut. Success meant the world before her—failure, a return to the Australian ranch. The great trial came in Brussels. The rest of the cast sang in French but Melba did not know sufficient French to sing her role so gave it in Italian. The trial was a triumph and engagements came from all parts of Europe. From that night Melba's success was assured and now she stands at the head of her profession. She says the secret of her success is hard work and confidence in her own ability. She is constantly studying and practicing new roles for she realizes that there must be constant growth. She has never returned to Australia but has recently presented a portrait bust of herself to the Melbourne Public Library. Her father is still living and thoroughly enjoys the fact that his little Nellie is now one of the world's greatest singers. Melba is a very beautiful woman with an exquisite taste in dress. She is known in all the capitals of Europe but always prefers an American engagement. She says the American audiences are quick to appreciate improvement and to reward it with applause. It seems a far cry from Nellie Mitchell the little shy Australian girl to Madame Melba the great prima donna, but the distance has been covered by pluck, genius, hard work and perseverance. It is a life that teaches a lesson.

CURRENT TOPICS IN AMERICAN HISTORY.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE COLUMBIA.

GREAT as is the satisfaction of the outcome of the International yacht race and the successful runs of the American yacht Columbia, probably for the first time in the history of these yacht races there is something of a real regret that the British challenger was not able to "lift" the cup and carry it back to England. This spirit arose from a feeling of fair-play and true sportsmanship that is highly creditable to the American people, and is partly, too, a tribute to the challenger, Sir Thomas Lipton, as a gentleman sportsman.

The Shamrock, an Irish yacht of Fife's best design was in lines an American model and was an improvement on the Defender. For several days it was so calm that every attempt to race was baffled but the Shamrock apparently showed to better advantage. In the first race in light winds the Columbia won after a close race. In the second, the Shamrock was disabled but owing to an iron-clad agreement the Columbia sailed over the course alone taking the race. The third and last race was a decisive trial which so showed the Yankee yacht's superiority that there could be no possible question of the fairness of the outcome.

Sir Thomas Lipton, the challenger, is a self-made man, who by his own brightness and perseverance has made himself wealthy and respected. His conduct in the races has been exceedingly fair and courteous and nothing has happened to mar the good feeling on both sides. A great improvement was noticeable in this race by the government keeping the course clear and preventing any interference by excursion steamers; a thing that has caused much annoyance and many charges of unfairness in former races. The patrol fleet was under command of "Fighting Bob" Evans, who enforced strict discipline.

The appointment of Archbishop Chappelle as Papal Legate to the Philippines and his official recognition by the United States is believed to be a step which will greatly assist in the pacification of the islands. As is well known the Catholics hold vast possessions in the archipelago, and while the Filipinos are generally of that religion there has been much feeling against the encroachments of the various orders of priests. This was one of the most prominent causes of the insurrections under the Spanish rule. Notwithstanding this the Filipinos are good Catholics generally speaking, and it is thought Father Chappelle will have great influence with them.

ARCHBISHOP CHAPPELLE.

The Papal Delegate will do the following things with the sanction of the United States Government: He will call a conference of the priesthood of the islands to be presided over by the Archbishop of Manila and will inform that conference that it is not the intention of the United States Government to seize the church property or prevent the free exercise of the Catholic religion.

He will show them that under the republican form of government in the United States there is the widest possible latitude of religious liberty. He will explain that the Catholic religion, under the sovereignty of the United States will have as much freedom of action and as much control over its parishioners as anywhere in the world, and that so far as the government is concerned there will be an absolute prohibition of interference in the affairs of the church.

Archbishop Chappelle will prove to the Filipino priests that opposition to the Government of the United States is unwise if that opposition grows from fear that the rights of the church are not to be respected, and that the Government of the American Republic is opposed to the religion which dominates the islands.

The Archbishop, accompanied by the best wishes of the President and the blessings of the Pope, is expected to remove much of the opposition of the revolutionists and to impress upon the people of the Philippines the fact that loyalty to the United States is not incompatible with devotion to the church, which is so highly respected in the United States.

The rainy season in the Philippines is practically over and the campaign will soon be opened. Already there have been several advances made into the interior, which seem to have been in the nature of preliminary expeditions. These while successful have accomplished no particular victory and have been attended with more or less casualties. Among those killed was Major Guy Howard, a son of Major-General O. O. Howard, retired. Major Howard lived formerly in Augusta, Maine, but has been in the regular army from boyhood.

The complaints against Gen. Otis continue to grow instead of diminishing and hardly a day passes in which some paper does not bring out some new story of incompetency. Admiral Dewey plainly states that "he has too many irons in the fire," and seems to be unwilling to have others share in military or civil honors in the East. Hardly a word is raised in his defence. COMFORT believes in fair play; but if Gen. Otis is as incompetent as pictured, and if he be simply a political appointment, the greatest service the President can do the country is to promptly remove him and appoint a commander who will have the confidence of the country.

It is rather hard to get at the true state of affairs at present as the Philippine question has been brought into politics in the various state campaigns. The President in his Western trip come out boldly for complete subjugation; while the opposition raised the cry of "Imperialism" and "Militaryism." The real questions involved were hidden under cries intended to arouse prejudices rather than to appeal to calm judgment. It is noticeable that those that attack expansion seldom venture to say what their own remedy would be, if in power. It was Mr. Blaine who once pointed out the freedom from responsibility enjoyed by the oppositions. How much easier to be a destructive than a constructive statesman.

Brigadier Gen. Guy C. Henry died last month in New York City, of pneumonia. In his death the country has met with a great loss. It will be remembered that he successfully served until recently as the military governor of Porto Rico, which brought him before the public conspicuously. He was essentially a fighting officer and beloved by all who met him, while his soldiers fairly worshiped him. His military career was an enviable one. He graduated at West Point and immediately entered active service at the beginning of the Civil War. Serving with great distinction he was the recipient of many honors and promotions. At the close of the war he was transferred to the Indian country where he served with equal valor against the Sioux and Cheyennes. His tireless work caused the aborigines to name him "Fighting Guy," which sobriquet followed him to his death.

GEN. GUY C. HENRY.

In one of the bitterest winters he pursued the marching redskins across the Canada line and administered the severest defeat the redmen had received for years, but unfortunately froze his hands and feet in the exposure and was crippled for life. In one campaign he was shot through the nose and his left eye was destroyed, but he coolly said: "Never mind, that's what we are here for." His career as an Indian fighter reads like a romance.

In the Spanish War he was appointed a Brigadier General, being immediately after appointed a Major General of Volunteers. Soon after he was made Governor General of Porto Rico, from which post he was obliged to resign on account of ill health, but not before he had secured the love of the people to a remarkable degree. At the time of his death he had just been appointed to command the Department of the Missouri with headquarters at Omaha.

The Philippine commission has been holding sessions in Washington and recently brought out a preliminary report to the President, which was immediately given to the country. It is a clear-cut, forcible document and thoroughly upholds the course of the government in carrying on the present war. It takes the same position that has been taken by the administration; that the insurgents must be suppressed with force and that when peace comes, Congress will settle the future course of the islands. The commission distinctly urged that the United States continues holding the islands until the inhabitants are capable of self-government. The commission have been in the islands and made a study of the question. This report is signed by all, and as Admiral Dewey is one of them it will have great weight in influencing the average citizen.

Speaking of Admiral Dewey reminds COMFORT that his physicians have asked him not to continue his receptions, as it is too much strain. At the same time the whole country congratulates him on the announcement of his marriage to Mrs. Hazen, the widow of the late Gen. Hazen of the army.

The recent reverses to the British army in South Africa have served to show emphatically how closely the two countries have united in their aims and lives. When all Europe was meditating an attack upon America in the recent Spanish War, England's friendship saved us from attack. To-day, while engaged in a fearful and bloody contest, England finds herself flouted by every European nation while the United States boldly repays the debt of friendship. With scarcely an exception the American press is showing by friendly voice how much this country appreciates that she was our friend in need a year ago.

Another source of International irritation has disappeared by the agreement of the two nations on a temporary boundary between Canada and Alaska. By the modus vivendi we practically hold all we have claimed as ours, while we allow for the present the use of a seaport to Canada, under her own flag. This agreement prevents further discussion until both nations have more time to consider the question or are ready to submit the whole question to arbitration. Unless the unexpected should happen, the vexed question of what is the real boundary will be fixed by a proper tribunal satisfactory to both powers.

We regret to notice the critical illness of Garret A. Hobart, the Vice President of the United States, who for several months has been ill at his home in New Jersey. As is the case with most public men when taken with any organic or serious diseases, the actual facts were kept from the public and friends concealed the real condition. While it was generally believed that Mr. Hobart must be a sick man, the public generally was in doubt until his law partner announced that there was no use in concealing the matter further, that he was dangerously ill and never would be a well man. Even now the public does not know exactly what the matter is, but it is a generally understood fact that he is not under any circumstances to resume public life; and the constant bulletins from his bedside indicate that the condition is more serious than is generally supposed. Mr. Hobart was born in 1844 and has served in many capacities in a public way besides amassing a large fortune through his business enterprise. He was elected a member of the National Committee for the Republicans in 1884 and served continuously on that committee until 1896 when he was elected Vice President; he took the office the following March. Mr. Hobart being incapacitated for public duty, Senator Frye of Maine, who is the President pro tempore of the Senate will act as presiding officer of that body until March 4th, 1901, when a new Vice President will be inaugurated. Mr. Frye is an able man who has had a distinguished career in public life, and was recently a member of the Commission at Paris which settled the details of peace in the Spanish War. He is a brilliant speaker, with much energy and force of character and sound judgment. He is very popular with his colleagues and is considered a very able presiding officer.

VICE PRESIDENT GARRET A. HOBART.

The by or off year elections in the several states this year were generally for inconsequential offices, but owing to the nearness of the national political campaigns of 1900 much interest was centered in them toward the last as they became largely personal in the general canvass. The administration sought to have its general policy upheld, while on the democratic side Mr. Bryan attacked the administration and carried on a canvass largely relative to his political chances in the forthcoming Democratic National Convention.

For this reason the canvass in Ohio and Nebraska became largely a personal matter, and in each state the son was upheld, Ohio giving a republican majority of about 50,000 while Nebraska went fusion for Bryan's ticket. In the various states local matters entered largely into the canvass, so that the result as a whole was not clear. In New York, the city went democratic for Tammany Hall administration heavily, but republican gains were made throughout the state. Maryland, naturally a democratic state which recently has been republican, after a close contest was carried strongly for the democrats. There was a bitter factional fight in the republican party which lost them any hope of carrying the state, and at the same time democratic admirers of Mr. Arthur P. Gorman who would like to see him named for the presidency realized that his only hope was in a great democratic success in his own state, which was given. Other states showed strong republican majorities, and generally where the direct question was raised as to the foreign policy of the government. In Kentucky there was a three sided fight, which at the time of the writing of this article was in doubt and claimed by all sides. The result was largely due to a fight for the control of the democratic party within its own lines, as Kentucky is naturally a democratic state although lately republican. By the time this paper is printed, our readers will fully know the result in the state that is now doubtful.

TESTIMONY POURS IN!

Proving the Value of the Slocum System in Consumption, Asthma, Weak Lungs, Catarrh, La Grippe and Wasting Diseases.

FREE OFFER TO OUR READERS.

From all parts of the country proof comes daily which shows that the Slocum system of treatment is doing a grand work in tens of thousands of homes where sickness and suffering had previously held victims in an iron grasp.

Consumption—that arch enemy of mankind—has carried away more people than all other diseases combined since the world began. Its ravages have been felt in every grade and walk in life, and yet all the money in the world a few years back could not stay this grim monster of death!

It remained for that medical genius and laboratory expert, Dr. T. A. Slocum, to solve the problem of destroying the consumptive bacilli. Since the day he began sending out his discoveries he has been the sole means of saving more than 80,000 people from a consumptive's grave.

Here is some of the latest evidence, which breathes of health and new life to all who heed it:

MR. WM. H. EPPS, South Boston, Va., writes:

"I suffered from weak lungs for two years and had despaired of relief. I rapidly lost flesh and became very weak. I employed a well-known doctor and he failed to do me any good. I then sent for another doctor, with no better results, and finally began to take several remedies for consumption, but all to no purpose. Hearing of Dr. Slocum's wonderful discoveries I sent for a full course of his remedies and the effect was magical. I continued the treatment faithfully and was cured. It is a wonderful blessing to humanity."

MR. RICHARD BLANK, Allegheny City, Pa., writes:

"I was a chronic sufferer for two years from catarrh of the head. Every time I got cold I suffered fearfully. My doctor could only give me temporary relief, but the Slocum treatment cured me in seven weeks."

These are merely samples of thousands. The Slocum treatment is a positive and masterly cure for all diseases where indicated. It heals raw mucous surfaces, restores the diseased tissues and builds flesh and strength.

This great system of medicine consists of four separate preparations, to be used together, and will banish every complication found in consumption, la grippe and its after effects, catarrh, bronchitis, lung debility, loss of strength, wasting away, etc.

Determined to prove the merits of his discoveries, Dr. Slocum again offers for a limited time his to all sufferers who write. Simply send your express and post office addresses to Dr. T. A. Slocum, 98 Pine Street, New York, stating that you read the offer in COMFORT, and he will promptly send a full course FREE Treatment fresh from his laboratories.

EDITOR'S NOTE.—This splendid Free Offer to our readers is genuine, and we hope every sufferer will write the Doctor at once, and also request all suffering friends to do the same.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

IT is a constant matter of wonder to me how so many women manage to keep youthful to the extent that they are often thought to be one-half their age. A noted physician declares it is only a matter of a few years when grim old Father Time will be cheated of his just dues and there will be no more old age, faded faces, or whitened locks. Every one will have perennial youth and can shake their finger at the years as they approach, and all through a certain curious little particle of a goat's anatomy called the lymph. If this proves true the man who made the discovery should have a monument of everlasting material tall enough to touch the skies. But enough of sermonizing; every one loves a pretty woman and I wish beauty had been every woman's dower.

New York maidens, who are always to the fore, are now wearing an exceedingly smart waist made of French flannel in the softest of pretty colors, among which violet predominates, some polka-dotted and some plain. These waists of flannel are really ousting those of silk and, as a change at least, are really prettier and so nicely suited to the season. They are made, usually, in Spencer fashion, the sleeves small and finished with a tiny flaring cuff, the front closed with small silver or brass buttons. Sometimes the back has a yoke just by way of variation. Another smart little garment Gotham maidens are wearing is a jacket of silk, in black of course, made in a variety of fanciful styles. A very smart little one is tight-fitting, with all its seams trimmed with flat folds, its edges scalloped and its revers covered flatly with creamy lace. Another is in Eton style, lined with white satin and provided with a dainty vest made in blouse fashion, of pinkish cream satin, covered with creamy lace, caught in at the waist with a gorgeous jeweled buckle. This style of coat adapts itself readily to either dressy or regular wear, being easily made very elaborate, or as sober as you could wish.

OF TAN MELTON.

It is most fortunate that the Eton jacket and its various modifications continues to be fashionable. It is a style becoming to almost all figures and can be made straight around or drooping in the front as may prove most becoming. If the revers are rounded the collar should be also, of course. As an odd garment to wear with various skirts, at this season especially, such a little jacket is exceedingly useful. A pretty little coat in black broadcloth has rounded revers and slightly rounded fronts and is slashed up the middle of the back. It is faced with broadcloth and has a band edging it, stitched with white. The sleeves are faced with white satin, covered with Irish lace. When these jackets are lined with color the revers should be faced with panne velvet of the same shade.

Fashions for little folks follow very closely in the wake of their elders. When mammas are wearing their skirts wide and flaring their small daughters copy them. When tight fitting skirts are in vogue for the grown-ups, then snug little circular skirts are worn by the small ladies. Every change in modes sees this tendency to follow and is this season shown in the tunic, flounce, collar-cape, chemisette and rever. Such a smart little frock for a miss of twelve is made up in plaid poplin, the squares very large; yellow, a pale, soft tone predominating, barred off with pale grays, violets and golden brown. The circular skirt is perfectly plain and is faced to the knees with corn yellow satin. The smart little bodice has a coat back fitting the figure easily, the scallops bound with yellow velvet. The guimpe and blouse front is of pale yellow crepe de chine, set off by rows of narrow black velvet ribbon.

A beautiful little party frock for a girl of eight years has a yoke of dead white crepe laid in cross folds, with neck band to match, the popular broad line across the shoulders being exaggerated greatly. The yoke is fastened at the back with pretty coral buttons. Then the bodice proper, being really decollette, is seemingly held on by straps passing over the yoke across the shoulders. A ruffle or lace bertha is required as a finish at the top of the bodice.

AN EVENING BODICE.

In the sketch a pretty bodice for a "grown-up" is shown with the little velvet shoulder strap as an appendage. The material is rose-pink satin, covered with lines of the same shade, the velvet bands over the arm and down the front of the bodice being black, while jet is used to form the squares. The smart little walking coat is in tan melton, very snug fitting and jaunty, with its front closed in large scallops, each one sporting a handsome button. The flaring collar is faced with mauve panne velvet, overlaid with creamy Irish lace.

The stylish street model picture is made up in leaf brown satin broadcloth, a thin quality, all the edges set off with stitched bands of the cloth.

Fur hats are, they tell me, to be much worn. Made up ones, only lacking a slight trimming, are already shown in the shops and are most tempting to women whose fingers are deft at adding the finishing touches. Large toques made of soft felt are extremely smart and up to date and are bound to be popular because so durable. Their trimming usually consists of a ducks' breast, or painted velvet wings. Beautiful white plumes for hats are made entirely of white tulle arranged in queer little fleecy frills as feathery as possible. They are especially elegant on hats of fur or velvet.

Hats made entirely of tulle are to the fore for smart winter wear, inappropriate as they may seem.

QUEER FEET.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE creatures that live in the water have very queer feet. The Razor Shell, a mollusk with a most handy foot, if one may use such an expression, is able to change it at his will into a shape like a bell-clapper and use it to hold on firmly to a rock like a grappling-hook, or thrust it out like a tongue, and bore into the sand with it for food. There is another mollusk of the bivalve family that can not only bore with his foot and swim with it like a fish, and leap from rock to rock with it like a jumping pole, but he also uses it to spin the fine thread with which he anchors himself after his journey is done. Even the stupid-looking crabs and lobsters can do many of these things with their feet.

They have their feet in very odd places. Some water creatures use them as wings; with others they are arranged around their heads in a circle like a crown; and some are "belly-footed," or have one flat foot under the body. This single foot wears a horny plate or shoe for protection. The one-footed mollusks have some other very eccentric arrangements, as for instance, teeth in their stomachs and on their tongues, and eyes at the ends of their fingers! The Hermit crab steals a shell and then uses its foot as a door to close its ill-gotten house.

Some water creatures are called "jaw-footed," because they grasp the thing they want so strongly with their feet and will not let go. Others, having fastened their feet to a rock, or fixed object, contract them and so slowly push themselves along. But a much prettier way is to row themselves with their feet for oars, just as the graceful Argonaut uses his arms. The ocean snail floats his dainty raft of eggs by means of his one foot, for the raft is filled with air and consequently very light in weight.

The starfish have a great many little feet with which they easily walk over the bottom of the sea. As these feet are made like hollow tubes they can also be used as pumps and so pump up food at need. The sea urchins are very well supplied for they not only have the tube-feet but crutches or spines, with which they dig out hollow places in the sand and they play around these until a silly mollusk ventures within reach of the feet and is caught in a twinkling! Some starfish have such delicate, fine little tubes for feet that they are called hair-footed, and only think, they carry inside of these, fairy-like fishing lines and hooks that may be cast out and drawn up at pleasure.

There are some pretty sea-creatures that play they are a flower garden in the blue waters. One jelly-like animal has feet like branching roots; the Medusa—oh, how lovely and gay it is, shining like flame or glistening in blue and silver!—has tentacles which I suppose may be reckoned either as fingers or toes in sea-creatures whose parts get strangely mixed, and these are shaped like leaves. They shake and quiver in the water like leaves of trees in their ocean of air, but they are also paddles to move along the waves and lassoos to catch their prey. There are sharp, needle-like thorns or spines on these curious leaves and they are sometimes poisonous as well. The polypus are prettier, for their tentacles when they open, are like flowers themselves. Would they not be charming playfellows down in the old Sea's pleasure ground?

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all Throat and Lung Affections; also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who wish it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS:

Again the happy holiday season is upon us, and probably all my nieces and nephews are too much engrossed in planning glad surprises for others, and in solving the problem of making two dollars do the work of five, to have much time for reading this month; so I will make my remarks exceedingly brief. I shall only take space to beg of you not to make "duty presents." Do not give simply because some one has given to you and you feel obliged to pay the debt. Do not give cheap trifles to those who cannot afford to give much to you, and reserve your handsome gifts for those who will send you expensive ones in return. This is the season for giving, not for barter and trade, and to make it truly Christmas we must give, hoping for nothing again. So do, my dear friends, and may the very spirit of Christmas be in your hearts, and may you have a joyful season; and, in the words of Tiny Tim, God bless us, every one.

Our first letter this month takes us quite to the other side of the country from the home of COMFORT, and tells us of the Government reservation near the beautiful old city of Monterey.

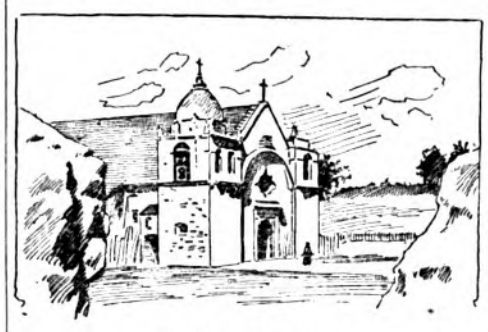
"One of the finest pieces of property owned by the United States is the Government reservation at Monterey. That so vast a tract of land should lie wild and uninhabited almost within the boundaries of the old Spanish capital, at first seems strange, but upon looking around, when one sees how completely it overlooks the bay and the surrounding country, it is easy to understand why it is thus held. The reservation lies between Monterey and Pacific Grove, and rises from close proximity to the bay to a commanding height. It is heavily wooded with the beautiful native pines and oaks and it is here, among these many trees, that the large yellow violet and the tall, delicate calachortus grow in such profusion. Countless birds live here and during the summer the wild notes of quail sound constantly in the sweet seclusion, for at this time they are busily engaged raising their young.

"Many trails lead in as many different ways through the trees but none show the wear of sightseers so much as does the path leading up to the old barracks and cannon. Perhaps this trail is more frequented than it would be did it not also lead to the deserted cabin of the old man who for years guarded the reservation and who died suddenly, leaving the impression that he had left treasure buried somewhere just without his cabin. The wide, deep holes dug about these walls testify to the faith many have had and still have in this imaginary story.

FATHER JUNIPER SERRA.

"In the most beautiful spot of the whole reservation, where the earliest and latest sunshine falls, is the burial place of some of our soldiers. Perhaps no other view in the world is grander than the one received standing beside this quiet little acre, and no soldier ever had a fairer resting place. Turning eastward one looks far across the quiet waters of the bay, with its many white-sailed fishing boats, to the mountains surrounding it, the vast evergreen gardens of the Hotel Del Monte and the rolling, wooded hills behind them. A heavy iron and granite fence surrounds this government cemetery and each Memorial Day so richly is it filled with all kinds of southern flowers that they remain here, although dried and faded, all the year.

"A little distance from here stands the imposing monument erected to the memory of Juniper Serra, the founder of the principal missions of California, among them being the beautiful Carmelo Mission at Monterey. The monument stands upon elevated ground, so close to the water that it is within calling distance of the quiet old wharf, and the shapely hands of the sculptured priest are extended as though silently bestowing a blessing upon all those who enter in or depart from this sunlit harbor."



MAUD B. RODGERS, Menlo Park, California.

A description of a country wedding which comes to me from Shiloh, Georgia, hardly seems to me genuine, so I must decline to print it. I fear, too, that our Georgia cousins would resent seeing such a picture of their people in print.

Hugh Clark, of Taylor, Texas, sends us a description of a contest between a cowboy and a steer, but as we have lately published a similar account I can only thank him for his letter.

Mrs. Elva Lupher, of Wellington, Kansas, sends us a very interesting letter on the opening up of a new country in Oklahoma, which I am sorry to say I cannot use for the same reason—we have recently had very similar descriptions.

Charles Martin, of Santa Ana, Texas, sends us a letter for which I can only thank him, as its matter is hardly suited to our page.

OLD CARMELO MISSION.

While we are upon the subject of reservations let us go down into Arizona and watch an Indian dance upon a reservation there.

"Little did I dream what the next forty-eight hours would bring me in the way of Indian experience when I left Fort Grant for duty at the Indian Agency and Military Post of San Carlos, Arizona.

"Forty miles before reaching our destination large numbers of Indian men, women and children climbed upon our train and settled themselves in every vacant space on the box and flat cars which were in front of the regular passenger coaches; and as we pulled out of Geronimo the train presented one of the most picturesque scenes I ever witnessed. The freight and flat cars were alive with Indians in all their gaudy colors, red, of course, predominating. I was told that we were near the San Carlos Indian Reservation, and that the Indians had the right, for thirty years, to ride upon the cars whenever and wherever they desired as part compensation for allowing the construction of the railroad through their reservation to the mining camp of Globe; and also that the issue of beef to the Indians was to take place at the agency on the following morning.

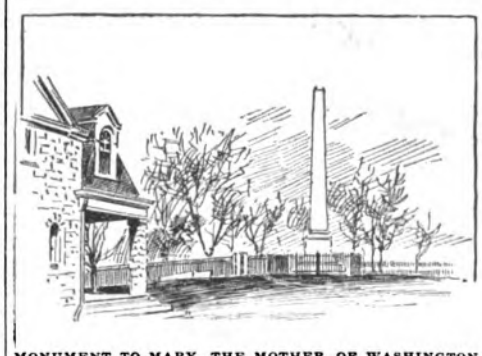
"Arrived at San Carlos, as far as the eye could see were the small, improvised camps for the use of the Indians for the one night which they were to remain at the agency, intermingled with the bright colored dresses of the squaws. I noticed that the squaws and girls tramped about afoot, carrying their papooses strapped to their backs, and carrying also whatever other luggage there was in the party, while the men rode their ponies and carried nothing.

"While I was gazing at the Indians I heard some one say: 'Are you going to the Devil's dance tonight?' and, turning, saw around me some of Uncle Sam's boys in blue. They explained that a great Devil's dance was to take place there among the Indians that night and that this dance was performed for the purpose of frightening away the Devil when he had, through his evil spirits, caused things to go wrong in the tribe.

"After dark the weird, monotonous beating of the tom toms could be heard, and I soon found my way to the brow of the hill overlooking the dancing ground. Below us, about a quarter of a mile away, was a great fire of blazing logs, around which was an ever increasing circle of Indian men and boys and a little to one side of the fire was a compact mass of Indians squatted in a circle around the musicians, who were chanting an unintelligible song, which at times excited with its wildness, then died away gradually to a low, long monotone, to be again succeeded by the wild chant. The squaws and girls were not yet visible. After descending to the circle I found that there were two classes of musical instruments, one a very hard, dry cowhide upon which several men were beating to keep time with the tom toms; these were nothing more than skins tightly stretched over pails, and upon them the musicians beat in a peculiar manner with strangely constructed little sticks. The chanting blended with the music in an indescribable way.

"Soon great numbers of squaws and girls seated themselves outside of the main circle, and now all was expectation and many were the glances cast toward the large group of tepees on a hill close by, from which the dancers were to come. In a short time we heard the tinkling of the little bells and a peculiar half-whistling, half-cooing sound as the great circle parted and five lithe young Indian men trotted into it one behind another. Then bedlam seemed to be let loose. The poor old cowhide fairly leaped from the ground under the frantic blows dealt upon it, while the dancers, in their paint and bells and great, grotesque head-dresses and masks, made a most weird and uncanny sight as they whirled this way and that, always keeping time with their contortions and with that peculiar cooing noise, to the music and chanting, and ever moving in perfect accord with each other.

"When it seemed as though the dancers must fall from utter exhaustion they suddenly uttered a shrill cry and darted out into the darkness as mysteriously as they came, their places being supplied in a few minutes by others similarly attired. By this time soldiers, citizens and Indians were intermingled in the great circle and the dance grew wilder, the music louder, and even the stolid squaws had become excited and had moved up close to the great campfire.



"Suddenly the dancers shot out into the darkness and the Devil Dance was ended."

CHARLES C. POWELL, San Carlos, Arizona.

Now we will travel east and visit the grave of "Mary, the Mother of Washington."

"Mary, the mother of Washington, selected for the place of her burial a spot on Kenmore land, close by a rocky crag and chasm which she preferred because, as she declared, it could never be cultivated. Here her remains lie, and the spot is marked by a monument worthy, by its massive foundation of granite, and its simplicity, stateliness and beauty, to preserve the memory of her who gave birth to our immortal Washington, and who by her own virtues and discipline contributed so powerfully to make him what he was.

"Prior to the year 1833, one single person, Silas E. Burroughs, a wealthy merchant of New York, was the only one who came forward for a work which ought to have enlisted the hearts and substance of the whole United States. He volunteered to furnish all the needed money and means for erecting a suitable monument over the grave of Mary Washington. A plan of a very ornate and beautiful monument was selected, a competent architect engaged, and the work begun. In 1833 Andrew Jackson, President of the United States, attended by his Cabinet and others, came from Washington to Fredericksburg and the corner stone of the monument was laid, with imposing solemnities. The work went on until the square body of the monument was completed, with its carved flutings and its polished marble pillars. Then came a financial disturbance with the re-election of President Jackson. Burroughs failed disastrously and the work on the monument stopped. Burroughs went to South America and other places, hoping to regain his fortune so as to complete his work. But money never came. The enormous rough marble plinth for the spire did come to the wharf in Fredericksburg, and by contract was moved to the site of the monument. It was deposited amid the weeds, shrubs, and rubbish near the unfinished structure, and there it remained for more than half a century. No stroke of sculptor's tool ever fell upon it.

"After the Civil war appeals were made to Congress to appropriate money to complete it or to build another monument in its place, but Congress would not move. Then the women of America took up the matter; a national association was formed, headed by the widow of Chief Justice Waite, and appeals were sent out. All the women in the country bearing the name of Mary, and all men interested were urged to give, and money poured into the treasury. A plan for a monument, solid, stately, yet graceful and beautiful was selected, approved, and the monument erected was on the site of the unfinished one which was removed, although its most graceful parts have been preserved.

"This monument was unveiled with imposing ceremonies on the 10th day of May, 1894, in the presence of the President and his Cabinet, Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and other high officials. On the front of the monument, in beautiful raised letters are the words 'Mary The Mother Of Washington'; and on the rear, cut in plain letters, are the words, 'Erected By Her Country-Women.' The monument is fifty-five feet high and cost sixteen thousand dollars, and is claimed to be the largest solid shaft in America. The grounds are beautiful and well kept, and resorted to by tourists from all parts of the world."

H. H. HALL, Nomini Grove, Va.

Ada Reed of Inglewood, Cal., sends us a description of an Indian scalp dance which she says she witnessed in Idaho; but as it is of the same nature as the Devil Dance of which a description is given this month and is, moreover, rather too blood-curdling for our page, I must content myself with returning thanks for it.

West again our fifth letter takes us, and lands us above the clouds, on the top of the lofty Mount St. Helena.

"Along the great Cascade range of mountains, in Washington and Oregon, are a number of lofty snow peaks which range in height from eight thousand to fourteen thousand feet above sea level. To ascend these snow mountains is attended with great labor, difficulties and peril, and in past years several lives have been lost in the attempt; but, despite the dangers and toil the most of the great snow peaks of the Cascades have been scaled by daring and intrepid mountain climbers. Every season parties are organized to climb these peaks, and in almost every instance they are successful. The purpose of the ascent is generally in the interest of mountain science. Often the parties are mainly composed of scientific men, professors in colleges, etc., and by means of these excursions many valuable discoveries have been made.

"One of the loftiest and most imposing mountains of the Cascades is Mount St. Helena, whose altitude above tide water is nearly eleven thousand feet. This mountain is located in the very heart of the Cascade range, in Washington, seventy miles in a northeasterly direction from the city of Portland, Oregon. The ascent of this colossal peak is attended with great difficulties and no little peril. Recently a party was organized to make the ascent. Several days were required to reach the base of the mountain and to scale its rugged sides, but finally, late one afternoon, the party arrived safely at the summit. They were footsore and weary, and concluded to pass the night there. It was a long, cold, comfortless bivouac, but the view of the sunrise on the following morning was indescribably grand, and richly repaid them for the discomforts of the night as well as for the difficulties and dangers of the long, hard climb."

J. MAYNE BALTIMORE, Spokane, Washington.

The letter from which the following extracts were taken is very interesting, but it was far too long for me to print entire, yet I think my readers will enjoy the following extracts from it.

"The battlefield of Gettysburg covers an area of twenty-five square miles in and around the town of Gettysburg, and has been converted by the Government into a National park, every foot of which is historic. The town itself, a quiet place of four thousand inhabitants, is filled with marks of the great struggle which took place there. Trees riddled with bullets, houses with shattered walls, and monuments of every kind, show where the fighting raged hottest. The position of each regiment, as in battle, is marked by grand monuments erected by the states whose men fought here. Indeed, in most of the streets of the town are monuments marking some place of interest, of some skirmish. The place where the first gun was fired is marked by the statue of Buford in bronze, and the very cannon itself is here flanked by four others. Numerous other monuments, representing various generals and their horses, are scattered about, while the intrenchments, artillery, ammunition and stone walls are preserved intact.

"Crossing the street in which the first skirmish occurred we enter the gates of the Soldiers' National Cemetery. At the entrance are two huge iron pillars, bearing the names of the states which have men buried here. The grandeur and magnificence of this cemetery are beyond description. The beautiful driveways are bordered by maples which form a green archway. The road is of crushed granite, the grass green and velvety, and flowers and shrubs are full of beauty. The monuments are all of granite, no marble being allowed here because of its tendency to decay. The New York monument has bronze figures upon the four sides, representing different scenes in the war. The Pennsylvania monument, of white granite, stands on the spot where Lincoln made his famous speech, and has that speech engraved upon it. The work was executed in Italy. On its top is the Goddess of Liberty; grouped around, on the four corners, are the statues of Peace, War, Plenty, and Industry. These statues are considered the finest on the grounds.

"In our admiration of these monuments we lingered too long, and found ourselves locked in; but our guide helped us over the stile into the citizens' cemetery, where we found ourselves again on the site of a great battle. Making our way over a fence we found the main battlefield. Here, on every side, were monuments, artillery, towers, statues and flagstaffs; the latter, we learned, are of Oregon fir.

"As it was growing dark we hurried away to view 'High Water Mark,' better known as the turning point of the war, or 'Bloody Angle.' The historic clump of scrub-oaks is still standing, hardly larger, they say, than in war-time. The monument stands in front of the oaks. It is in book form, engraved with a suitable inscription. To the right is the historic stone wall over which the Confederates came by thousands, thinking themselves sure of an easy victory, but where, in the open wheatfield beyond the most of them met their death. Close by here is a lookout tower, one of the fourteen placed at intervals about the grounds, and from which may be seen the whole field, Culp's Hill, Devil's Den, Little and Big Round Top, and, in the background, Antietam."

MABEL E. JAMES, Salem, Oregon.

D. W. C. Morris, of White Plains, N. Y., has our acknowledgements for favors received, but which I cannot use as none of them are quite adapted to our needs.

And now, with many wishes for a Merry Christmas and plenty of gifts for every one of my nieces and nephews I will say good by until 1900.

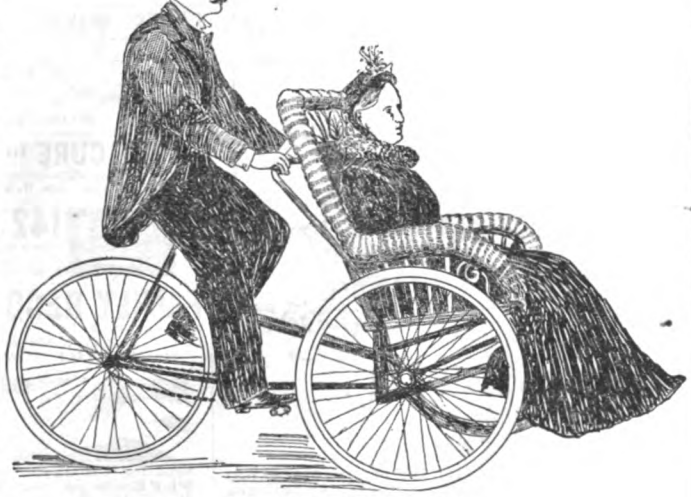
CONDUCTED BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

OF course the bicycle will be very much in evidence at the Paris Exposition next summer and there will be on exhibition not only every possible variety of wheel and all the modern and most up-to-date improvements, but all the strange devices and even freaks that have been invented since the World's Fair. Major Brackett, secretary of the United States Commission for the exposition says the bicycle and automobile exhibit will be in the Bois de Vincennes in a building provided for the housing of the railroad exhibits of all countries. A space of 8,600 square feet has been secured for the American bicycle building, which will have a special track for showing the wheels in operation. American builders, it is expected, will make the largest and most comprehensive exhibit of any country as is to be expected, since we manufacture far the greatest amount of bicycles in the world. A track some two miles in length and running around the lake Daumesnil in the Bois de Vincennes, has been provided for showing automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds in operation and a space of 4,300 square feet in the automobile building has been secured for American exhibitors. According to good authority every manufacturer will be represented, and the keen interest shown by foreign countries in this matter will make these places among the most popular at the Exposition.

Of course it is early to predict much with certainty regarding the wheel of 1900, but all the same work on the wheels for next year is well started. It seems to be pretty clear that most makers will make the chainless wheel the chief product of their output. The bevel gear has demonstrated its practicability the past year and there will be no further hesitancy in turning out wheels with this gear in large numbers. This sort of wheel has come to stay and will be more popular next year than ever. Makers seem to be pretty nearly a unit in regard to them, and according to those who seem to know the most about it, the wheel of 1900 will be much lighter than that of the past season. This will apply to the chain as well as to the chainless varieties. We all rode wheels too light in 1896 and 1897. Last year and this wheels were much heavier and the change seemed to meet with favor. But there has been a reaction and riders want lighter wheels and will get them. The past year the average road wheel weighed anywhere from twenty-five to twenty-seven pounds and some of the chainless ones came near to thirty pounds. It is predicted, however, that next summer the average weight will be from twenty-three to twenty-five pounds, which means a reduction all round of from one to three pounds. Also, many people have asked that seven inch cranks shall be placed on their wheels and particularly those who purchased late in the season. It is said that the seven inch crank will be the general thing next year. In confirmation of what I say, let us see what a well-known manufacturer said in The New York Tribune a few weeks ago:

"The new models will, as a general thing, show a decided change from those issued this year. The various styles of chainless wheels will be made in larger numbers than this year, and the opinion seems to be general that this sort of wheel has won its spurs, and that there will be no further hesitancy in turning out such machines in large numbers. This will mean a corresponding lessening in the output of the chain wheels. The tendency among manufacturers in the last two years has been to make their bicycles heavier. During the seasons of 1896 and 1897 the tendency toward lightweight machines was carried to an extreme, and now some of the makers are of the opinion that they have gone almost to the other extreme this year. This change in sentiment will probably result in smaller tubing, smaller sprockets and smaller tires all around. There is even now a demand for inch and a half tires by those who for two years have been using from an inch and five-eighths to an inch and three-quarters. The general effects will be to make the bicycles less massive in appearance. From 27 to 32 pound wheels are as common on the roads to-day as were the 20 and 24 pound wheels of two or three years ago. The desire all along the line seems to be to lessen the weight of the bicycle from two to five pounds, and this can be accomplished without loss of much rigidity or strength."

The price of wheels has been steady for the past year and there is to be no great change during the season to come. Chain wheels will bring from thirty to fifty dollars and the chainless will bring from sixty to seventy-five. This is a decided improvement upon the old days when you couldn't get a decent wheel of any reputable make for less than a hundred dollars. It seems as if anybody and everybody might own a wheel nowadays. Selling wheels, however, is not so easy a business as might be imagined. A dealer tells me that even in these days when cycle construction has become so perfect and everybody is supposed to know all about the "silent, pneumatic-shod steed," there are many instances among buyers of ignorance of the most common things.



In New York, recently, a man and woman went to a well-known dealer and began to inspect a bevel-gear, chainless, which was on a stand. The salesman explained the wheel and in the meantime made the "wheel go round" fast enough to eclipse Eddie McDuffie or Major Taylor. Finally the woman announced that she understood the make-up of the machine perfectly, but she thought she would not take that particular wheel because the front wheel did not move as fast as the rear. Then the man insisted that if it were a chain wheel the front one would keep up with the back wheel and they were both in solemn earnest. It took that salesman a good half-hour to convince those two people that only the rear wheel received the power and that when the wheel was ridden, the two wheels would turn together.

How do you reckon the rate of speed at which a bicycle is traveling? Here is a way given by an expert. He says each bicycle has a basis of time upon which an estimate of miles an hour can be accurately made by counting the revolutions of the pedals which occur within this period. In such an estimate each revolution represents a mile. To obtain the basis of time, multiply the gear of the wheel by five and divide the product by twenty-eight. For instance take a sixty-eight gear; multiplied by five it gives three hundred and forty, which divided by twenty-eight is approximately 12.1. So if the pedals make ten revolutions in twelve seconds, the speed per hour is very nearly ten miles, or if the number of revolutions be twenty, then the rider is going twenty miles an hour.

According to statisticians, when a man walks a mile he takes on an average 2,263 steps, lifting the weight of the body at each step. When he rides a bicycle of average gear he covers a mile with the equivalent of only 627 steps, bears no burden and covers the same distance in less than one-third of the time. Hence it is cheaper to walk than to ride, all things considered, isn't it?

When buying a wheel, unless you are already up in bicycle lore be sure you thoroughly understand all about the different parts of the machine. Learn how to attach and detach the tires, how to manage the valves, how to adjust the chain and how to remove and replace the pedals and cranks. This knowledge will be worth dollars and time and good temper to you when you are off on the road all by yourself some day.

Few wheelmen, perhaps, are aware that oil is a deadly enemy to brass and steel and that it accounts for many breakages in joints of bicycles that have been used for some time. When the machine has been well rubbed with an oiled rag the oil collects at the joints and gradually eats its way in, parting the brass from the steel so that the joint finally gives way. To clean the frame it should be wiped with a soft sponge and dried with a soft cloth.

THE NEW CARRY-CYCLE.

It is not infrequently found that little blisters will develop on tires. They grow until they get as large as the little finger and fill the amateur with wonder as to the cause. It is because there has been a slight puncture through the rubber as far as the canvas and then through the tiny hole dust and sand have penetrated and so produced something like a wart. To get the dirt out the tire should be deflated, the rubber slit with a needle and then the dust blown out with an inflator. After that, rinse in some thickening solution and let fasten dry before you inflate again.

In London there is a movement on foot to insure against cycle accidents. A subscription of half a sovereign or so will cover one in all accidents not due to actual negligence or too open carelessness. When you have a puncture, all you have to do is to take your wheel to the repair shop, present your membership card and repair is attended to with no further trouble to yourself. The bill is sent to headquarters. Such an association would be a good thing in this country.

The wheelman has not been altogether selfish. He demanded good roads for himself, but he knew full well that the farmer and the teamster would be benefited as well. He had their opposition at first, but he did not care and persisted in his crusade. Today the farmer and wagoner stand side by side with the wheelman in the demand for better roads throughout the country.

One of the greatest results of the popularity of the bicycle, indeed, is the improvements on our national highways. All that science and invention have done to give us the automobile would be practically useless without the good roads which make them a practicability. The automobile cannot exist in regions where the wheel sinks half way to the hub in mud. So let us keep on ever singing its praises. Here's to the up-to-date bicycle of 1900. May it be more of a success, even, than any of its predecessors!

The cut this month shows a new invention already on the market and called the "Kalamazoo Carry-Cycle." They are particularly desirable for invalids and old people. They are said to be easy to run and steer by either a lady or a gentleman and they cost about the same as an ordinary tandem. The chair is detachable so that the bicycle part can be used separately when it is desired.

Rheumatism Cured by a Simple Remedy That You May Try Without Spending a Cent—Cured Many Cases of 30 and 40 Years Standing.

If you have rheumatism, write to me and I will send you free of cost a trial package of a harmless remedy which cured me and thousands of others, among them cases of over 50 years standing. It is a grand remedy and in order that every suffering reader may learn about it, I will gladly send them a Trial Package free, even if more than 25,000 Invalids should apply. Many a distressing case of rheumatism, among them some, which defied Hospital, Drugs, Electricity and medical skill, were successfully cured. In Denham, Ind., it cured a lady who then cured 15 of her neighbors. In Prosser, Nebr., it cured Mrs C. Morritz who had been afflicted for 52 years. In Fountain City, Wis., it cured Hon. Jacob Sexauer, after suffering for 33 years, notwithstanding having employed seven physicians. At 130 Oak St., Vincennes, Ind., this remedy rescued Miss Emma Callender from a case of rheumatism which her physicians considered fatal. Rev. C. Sund of Harrisville, Wis., testifies that this remedy cured two members of his congregation, one who had suffered 18, the other 25 years. Thousands of similar instances could be mentioned where this horrible plague has been completely cured. Write at once for a free trial package and other information for it is an honest remedy that you can test before you part with your money. Address John A. Smith, 554 Summerfield Church Bldg., Milwaukee, Wis.

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living palmists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:

Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to COMFORT PALMISTRY CLUB, Augusta, Maine.

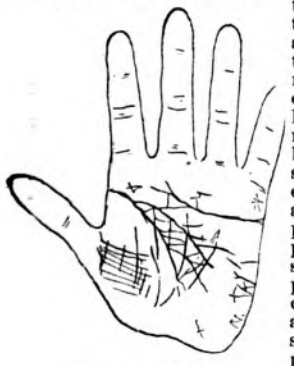
No notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheet of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carefully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixatif, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an atomizer. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-greased, palm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Several minutes will be required to get this impression and great care must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putty is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixatif.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

Also, that letters not complying with them will go into the waste-basket. Readings cannot appear for several months after impressions are sent.



IN spite of the fact that we keep the rules pertaining to this column standing at the head of this department, certain people still write asking what they must do to have their hands read here, how they must send them, what it costs, etc. PLEASE READ THE ABOVE RULES.

"Winifred" wants to know where the marriage lines are. The deep horizontal lines at the side of the hand under the little finger are the first marriage lines, although sometimes these appear when there is nothing but an engagement. For the corroboration of them as marriage lines, look for a fine line following the life line, or for a similar one following the fate line and close to it. If either of these lines appear in both hands the marriage is pretty sure to take place. The "Comfort Guide" is a little work on Palmistry issued by Cheiro, assisted by myself for the use of readers of this department. It costs fifty cents.

Another reader asks where Cheiro's "Language of the Hands" can be procured. His publisher is Brentano, Union Square, New York, and the book costs $2.00.

"Charlotte" asks what it means to have a circle in the triangle, close to the head line on the left side of the fate line. The circle is a very rare sign and only has a good signification when it appears on the Mount of Apollo. By the side of the life line it would mean some injury at the time indicated which would of course affect the fate line. Two lines in percussion under the little finger, one being less distinct than the other, would mean that the person does not marry the one they love best. The Mount of Sun surrounded by short lines means that the talents will be somewhat scattered and the person will not get the best out of life. The fate line crossing an island on the lower part of the life line is not a good sign; when it begins on the Mount of Venus with an island it indicates some mystery or disgrace attached to the birth. The life line ending in a fork denotes poverty in old age.

The first hand to be read this month belongs to "Nellie, 313." This is a hand denoting an upright and rather artistic nature with fairly good lines. This person will make a good musician or artist. She will, however, be methodical in her nature and orderly. She will marry some person of distinction but will either grow away from her husband, or become less attached to him at about the age of thirty and the breach between them will never lessen. This event will cause her some worriment at the time, but she will be preserved from any evil effects from it and it will be happier in the latter part of her life than she was the first part. Her health during childhood and youth was not strong, but improves as she goes on in life. She will travel a great deal and will once in her life be in great danger from drowning. She has an imaginative temperament and is oversensitive. She will be fond of books that deal with the imagination, such as novels and poetry. During the middle part of her life she will have some trouble with affairs of the heart, but these will pass away and she will be happier during the latter part of her life than she has ever been. This is a hand in which good and evil are mixed, but neither predominates.

"S. E. K." has a very peculiar hand; it is a hollow hand which always is a sign of trouble. There is some severe sickness or great trouble at about the age of eighteen or twenty and I think the life line is almost too deep to warrant the best of health. An early attachment at about the age of twenty results in marriage, but I do not think the marriage will prove of the happiest nature. The two parties will grow apart and "S. E. K." will have another attachment later in life which may result in a second marriage. She is a person of a great deal of tact and a strong imagination. She also has a good deal of will power and a highly artistic temperament in all things. She will be dainty in her tastes and always likes to have things nice and pleasant around her. She has the courage of her convictions and will always dare to do whatever she wants to do. She will not live to a very great age and will probably have some serious attack of illness about the age of fifty. I do not see any signs of wealth in her hand and think she will always have to work as hard as her strength will permit.

A second set of hands has been received from "H. C. G." and from "Lygia." These have already been in the October and November numbers.

"A. B." wants to know what is the triangle proper. It is the three cornered space in the middle of the hand formed by the junction of the lines of life, of head and of health. The line of health runs from the Mount of Mercury down towards the life line. It does not appear in all hands in which case the triangle must be reckoned with the line of health as imaginary. This triangle is sometimes called the Plain of Mars. If this triangle is well traced and neat with good even lines it indicates good health, good luck, a long life and a courageous disposition. If it is large with the lines curving outward, with a good healthy color, it denotes liberality, generosity and a noble soul, but if it is small with the lines curving inward, it shows pettiness, cowardice and avarice.

"S. E. K."

Sometimes a triangle will form itself in a hand which was originally without it. This means that the health will improve greatly with advancing years. If the skin is hard and rough inside the triangle there will be great hardihood and strength of nerve. A cross in the triangle shows a quarrelsome and contrary disposition and many crosses betoken bad luck. A star in this triangle denotes riches obtained with much difficulty and worry. If this star is the termination of a worry line it indicates sorrow.

The quadrangle is the square space between the lines of the heart and head. It is bounded on the east, so to speak, by an imaginary line coming down from between the first and second fingers and on the west by another from between the third and fourth fingers. This quadrangle should be even in width all the way through. It should be smooth and comparatively free from lines, in which case it indicates fidelity, loyalty and a good disposition. If it is too narrow in the center it gives deceit, injustice and an avaricious disposition. If it is too wide it shows imprudence and sometimes folly. If it is widest under the little finger, it shows that a generous nature has grown avaricious, if it is too narrow it shows a continual anxiety about reputation. Filled up with little lines, it shows a weak head. A well formed star in a quadrangle is a sure indication of trustworthiness and also of a considerable fortune won by the subject's own merit.

A quantity of little rays running across the line of life into the triangle accompanied by short nails are a certain sign of worries, estrangement of friends and similar troubles.

A line starting from the Mount of Venus and ending in a square in the palm of the hand denotes a narrow escape from marriage with a bad man or woman. A line extended from a star on the Mount of Venus to a fork under the finger of Saturn betrays an unhappy marriage. A line going from a star on Venus to the Plain of Mars and then turning up to the Mount of Apollo where it meets a single ray denotes a great inheritance from some near relation. Two worry lines running parallel from the Mount of Venus to that of Mars denote two love affairs at the same time and a star joined to these lines denotes that the pursuit ends in trouble. Any worry line coming from a star on the Mount of Venus denotes the death of some dearly loved friend.

I CURE FITS

When I say I cure I do not mean merely to stop them for a time and then have them return again. I mean a radical cure. I have made the disease of FITS, EPILEPSY or FALLING SICKNESS a life-long study. I warrant my remedy to cure the worst cases. Because others have failed is no reason for not now receiving a cure. Send at once for a treatise and a Free Bottle of my infallible remedy. Prof. W. H. PEEKE, F.D., 4 Cedar St., N.Y.

The Wizard of the West.

Prof. S. A. Weltmer of Nevada, Mo., Astounds the World by His Remarkable Cures.

HIS METHOD TAUCHT TO ALL.

Disease, with its countless fears and pains, beats against the human constitution with agonizing results.

PROF. WELTMER.

This acknowledged demon to human happiness and peace was not born of Nature, nor of God, it is the handiwork of humanity itself and can in all cases be dispelled by human hands. Take all classes of disease, be it that peculiar to woman or that which man suffers from indiscretions, whereby he outrages Nature or any other disease which the human flesh is heir to, it simply proves that the natural functions of the human body are abnormal. A great Scientist, Prof. S. A. Weltmer, of Nevada, Mo., has originated a method of Magnetic Healing known as Weltmerism, whereby he proves the above statement to be absolutely true. This wonderful man has put his method to a severe test, and the outcome of it is, that in less than two years he has cured more than 100,000 afflicted of every disease known to man or woman. His Method goes to the very foundation of the disease, and without the aid of drugs or the surgeon's knife he in a perfectly natural manner places the entire constitution in that condition in which Nature meant it to be, thereby dispelling disease as if by magic. His Method is so perfect, that in its wide scope it reaches all classes of people, for through it Prof. Weltmer cures patients at a distance just as readily and permanently as he does those that come to Nevada for treatment. Through the courtesy of that great scholar and scientist, Prof. Kelly, who is the co-laborer of Prof. Weltmer, we are able to publish a few of the many thousands of testimonials in his possession.

Hon. Press Irons, Mayor of Nevada, was afflicted with kidney and bladder troubles for ten years and could find no relief in the usual remedies. In one week he was completely restored by Prof. Weltmer.

Mrs. Jennie L. Linch, Lakeview, Mo., was for two years afflicted with ulceration of the womb, heart and stomach troubles and general debility; was reduced to a mere skeleton. Cured by the Weltmer Absent Treatment. In less than 30 days gained 15 pounds.

Mrs. Lavisa Dudley, Barry, Ill., suffered for thirty years with neuralgia and stomach troubles. Nothing but morphine would relieve her. Permanently cured in a few weeks by the Absent Method of treatment.

Mr. John S. Small, Colfax, Ill., was deaf in his left ear for seven years; could not hear a watch tick when placed against his ear. Was permanently cured in three days by Prof. Weltmer.

Anyone writing to Prof. S. A. Weltmer, Nevada, Mo., will receive a 40-page illustrated magazine and a list of testimonials from men and women who owe their health and happiness to Weltmerism; also much information on this science of healing.

TEACHES HIS METHOD TO OTHERS.

PROF. KELLY Sec'y and Treas.

The American School of Magnetic Healing is organized under the laws of the State of Missouri. Prof. Weltmer is the president of this institution, and Prof. J. H. Kelly the secretary and treasurer. It is impossible for Prof. Weltmer to attend to the enormous demands made upon him to cure. He, therefore, wishes others to take up his profession, so that he may call upon them to assist him in his noble work. With this in view the American School of Magnetic Healing was founded. The method perfected and in use by this school is so complete in all its details that the students become as efficient as Prof. Weltmer himself, in this great art to cure, in ten days. This noble profession is taught either by mail or personal instructions. Any one who desires can learn it, and any one who learns can practice it. This has been abundantly proven by the great number who have been instructed and who are in the active practice of healing by this method. This is beyond doubt the best paying profession of the age, as students who have learned this method through the American School of Magnetic Healing are earning from $10 to $50 per day.

The following letter is one of the many in the possession of the American School of Magnetic Healing:

Prof. J. H. Kelly, Secretary, Nevada, Mo.:

DEAR SIR:—Your mail course in Magnetic Healing was received some months ago. After reading same, I caught your idea and at once proceeded to put it into practice, and found I could accomplish all, and even more than I anticipated. I have never failed to get immediate results in all cases treated, and I have made a number of cures in cases that have been given up by the best of our physicians as incurable. I expect to devote my entire time to this work, but should I never use it outside of myself or family, would consider it the best investment I ever made.

J. T. IGLEHART, Meridian, Miss.

What real fun our Puritan forefathers and foremothers did miss when they refused to keep Christmas Day lest they should seem to assent to all the abuses of the "Established Church." No wonder that their descendants have acquired a difficult set of principles, and that the Christmas holly and mistletoe and the Christmas greens show bright against the New England snows.

The Vanderbilt will made some of the New York papers come out with the pathetic head line, "Cut off with a Million." It emphasizes the idea that riches are relative. All the money worshipers breathed a sigh of relief when they read that the second son had come to the rescue of the eldest born with a gift of $6,000,000. On that young Cornelius can keep the wolf from the door. "Cut off with a Million!!"

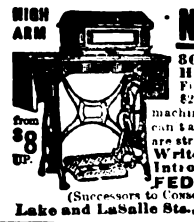
Admiral Dewey has certainly stood one ordeal like a hero. That is the searching ordeal to all feelings of personal vanity in being required to face about a million pictures of himself. When we reflect on the trouble the average individual has in getting even one photograph that is satisfactory—the shock that his vanity suffers when he receives a bunch of negatives and the careworn look that is the usual every-day appearance of a photographer we know what a picture means to the average citizen. Our poor Admiral has had to face whole platoons of pictures, from the tiny one on badges to the ambitious old painting, and history does not record that he said anything. He may have been beyond the power of utterance but he certainly endured in heroic silence.

The genius that discovered that there were really only nine jokes in the world and that all the rest were variations, should turn his attention to classifying the motives of Christmas stories. Dickens is in a class by himself, but the rest! Class one—some one comes home on Christmas eve—long lost boy or daughter or lover or husband. Class two—the indifferent husband has a change of heart and surprises his wife with a gift. Etc., etc., etc. As for jokes—it is always the old one about the bill coming home. But when one reflects that human ingenuity has been taxed for one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine years we cannot wonder at the lack of new motive in the Christmas story. We can only admire the people who make bricks as good as new with the same old straw.

The message "Peace on earth good will to men" is one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine years old. Its latest anniversary, Christmas of 1899, repeats the sad fact that it is yet a sentiment not put to practical use. Never since the message came has the anniversary of Christ's birth found the whole world at peace. The wars being urged by the two great Anglo-Saxon nations are righteous wars in that they are fought in the cause of freedom and equality. As far as war can be right and necessary these wars are. In spite of this, the season of the birth of the Saviour must bring serious thoughts to all deeply interested in the ideas of universal disarmament and arbitration as a means of settling disputes. The vision of "peace on earth, good will to men" goes hand in hand with the poet's vision of the millenium where the war drums throb no longer and the battle flags are furled in the parliament of man, the federation of the world.

The proposition to make the Dewey Arch permanent finds eager support in all who saw the stately beauty and grace of the white arch. Critics affirm that nothing so beautiful was ever erected in America and that even Europe with its treasures of art cannot match this work of American sculptors in honor of American heroes. The later proposition to make the arch endure in marble and to honor the whole navy instead of one man also merits hearty support. It is estimated that at least a million will be needed. If the committee would organize a scheme of small contributions and have a plan by which every American citizen should be asked to contribute twenty-five cents the sum would be forthcoming in short order. The arch is too beautiful to be allowed to become only a memory. This war has changed the destiny of our nation and the most thrilling events of the war were enacted by the American navy. Let the people rear the arch in solid, enduring marble.

People have become somewhat satiated with the various societies, books and preachments on how to live well. They have turned at last to serious discussion of the problem how to live long. The Hundred Year Club is an expression of this interest in the subject of longevity. Occasionally a centenarian is found who has never indulged in narcotics or stimulants and then the student of longevity mournfully lays aside his pipe and swears to shun the cup that cheers and inebriates. He no sooner comes to this conclusion than another centenarian appears who confesses to violating every rule of health, one at a time and in a bunch. He has never done anything that any one ought to do and he has lived a hundred years to tell the story. These are the exceptional cases from which it is impossible to prove or make a rule. The large life insurance companies prepare statistics that really cast some light upon the problem of long life. If you would have your days long in the land become a minister of the gospel. Out of every 170 ministers 42 reach the age of seventy years. The farmers come next in the record of long lives as 40 out of every 170 attain the desired age. Then come teachers and lawyers and last of all the doctors. Only 24 out of every 170 doctors reach the age of seventy. The choice of a profession then is something more than a choice of means of livelihood, it is a choice of long life or short. Theologians complain that fewer men wish to enter the ranks of the ministry. Let the statistics be published and the public understand that saving souls guarantees a long life and saving bodies insures a short life and the situation may change.



There are two graces of life that need careful explaining and application at Christmas time. One is "The Art of Giving," the other "The Art of Receiving." Without an understanding of these two arts the pleasure of the Christmas season may be turned into real unhappiness. The art of giving involves conditions that burden even the most delicate tact. The gift must not be of a nature that will create a sense of obligation in the recipient—on the other hand it must not be an actual necessity for few people are happy minded enough to take the view that they can get along without the necessities if they have the luxuries of life. Hence they procure the necessities, and a gift that is a luxury carries with it a double pleasure. To give a gift graciously as well as generously, to give a gift that shows the personality of the giver and an appreciation of the tastes of the receiver, all this and much more is a part of the art of giving. The art of receiving is even more difficult in its fine relations. It may be more blessed to give than to receive but it surely is far more difficult to receive with tact. How often is the entire spirit of Christmas marred by the fact that some one has not learned the art of receiving. The art is one so difficult to acquire, so closely related to all that is tactful and courteous in human relations, that a volume would hardly give the primary principles of the art. In spite of this the plainest person, the one least familiar with the arts and graces of society may understand perfectly all that is required to make one proficient in the art of receiving. Much pleasure may be added to the Christmas season by a loving consideration of these two arts—giving and receiving.

We find a singular lack of unanimity in the press utterances concerning our prospective ownership of Cuba, the Philippines and the Hawaiian Islands. The Jingo part of the press boldly proclaim the inevitable destiny of America to lie in the line of conquest, while the ultra-conservative portion bitterly deplore the growth of imperialism and foresee the downfall of the Republic in the signs of the times. It is with neither of these extremists that the thinking American, familiar with his country's history and precedents, must side. One of the principal arguments against the purchase of Louisiana was that no nation possessing such an extent of territory could hold together. This seems absurd to us but the modern inventions of the railroad, the steamship and the electric telegraph have made the conclusion absurd. At the time of its statement the territory was actually farther away from the seat of government than Manila is to-day. We have not found it difficult to govern this territory, but we have found it difficult with our form of government to reconcile the warring interests of sections. In a federal government where each part of the nation in time assumes an equal share in the government, the annexation or acquisition of new territory presents features of difficulty not possible under a monarchial form of government. We have scarcely solved the problem presented by the black element in the South and the Indian in the West. If the settlement of questions at the end of the war should force upon us the wardenship of this alien people, it is safe to say that the progressive American nation will find means to govern and assimilate the elements that seem foreign to our ideas. We do not need this territory, it is doubtful if we even want it, but if it seems political prudence to keep what we have won we believe we shall know how to do so. "Westward the course of empire takes its way" has been true of this nation and if extreme west not stopping at the line of the Pacific shall become "east" again we shall be equal to the problem. When Spain began her conquests of colonial possessions under Philip II. her imperial arms were a globe representing the world with a horse leaping upon it. In his mouth was a scroll with the motto, "Non sufficit orbis," (the earth is not sufficient.) We disclaim any such ambition; we are even content with the ocean boundaries that Nature has set—but if we are forced to take the earth by the fortunes of war we shall know how to accommodate our ideas, our traditions and our government to the strain.

Something About an Opera Chorus.

The attention of most every person is at times called to the peculiar fact of how little foundation there is for what is really a popular opinion. It is really strange how often an error will become what is supposed to be a fact in the mind of almost every person. Very often this is brought about by being told in youth some point that fixes the idea, and in later years examination is never made into the subject to find out how much foundation there may be in the belief that exists.

Just recently a newspaper paragraph in one of the papers of the day spoke in a slurring manner of the make-up of opera choruses in the metropolis, and suggested that more attention should be paid to obtaining cultured singers for such positions rather than to fill the stage with a lot of people lacking in character and musical culture.

The appearance of this article in a well known and authoritative paper caused much indignation among the better class of chorus singers and lead to the representative of another noted newspaper making some inquiry into the make-up of the choruses then performing in the city. The interesting facts obtained relative to the make-up of one opera chorus, which will serve as an example of all then singing in the city, seemed typical of the general run. Of the particular company which we mention, the information was elicited that no less than 85 per cent. had received a technical and thorough musical training in conservatories; that 35 per cent. had received a musical education in some of the institutions of Europe, and that over one-half had a grand opera repertory, in some form or other.

We all know how often derogatory remarks are made about chorus girls and how flippantly they are spoken of in ordinary conversation; but this canvas would open the eyes of any one to the injustice of the careless remarks which might hurt the reputation of any girl, for it was found that among the women of this particular chorus four were daughters of ministers. No less than 15 per cent. had been educated at convents or other religious seminaries, and 30 per cent. more had received a liberal college education. The parentage of the girls was fully as interesting as any other figures which were obtained, and it was found that over 60 of the fathers were men in the professional walks of life. Five per cent. of the girls were possessed of independent private means and had adopted this life in order to have something to do in the way of work, or because they had stage ambitions; and the closing fact, which was as interesting as the rest in this census, was that over 50 per cent. of the men in the chorus had a college education.

Hundreds of active musical people have written us words of commendation on the success of COMFORT'S music offer. Progressive people appreciate low prices for the best things. What is done every day in business COMFORT is now doing in music, by giving the most value for the least money. Such an offer of sheet music for a cost just about sufficient for postage is only given by COMFORT as will be seen on another page.

Choosing Music For a Profession.

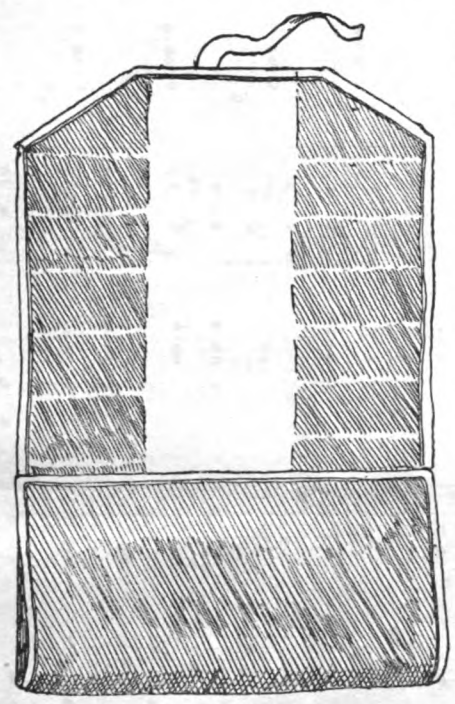
Often when talking with musical people we will hear vain regrets that some friend did not choose a musical profession or failed to study music harder when young. Such persons almost always express perfect confidence in their own powers to have met with musical success had they only adopted it as a profession.

It is to such people that COMFORT wishes to say a word; and more especially should the advice be heeded by those still young who contemplate becoming professionals mainly because they believe that in a social way the life is pleasant and that it does not mean work or sacrifice to attain success. To the first we would say that it is useless sighing over the past and the only question that can now present itself is whether or not you have sufficient musical ability to make it worth the while to devote the necessary time and money to it to make a success now. To look at the fact squarely in the face, few people have musical genius. Many have ability and a certain amount of capability, and it is such that spurred on by the ill-tuned advice of flattering friends become filled with an almost conceited idea that they above all others have the true musical gift. The result is that hundreds of people with little or no ability rush into the field and crowd with a mass of half-educated instrumentalists or vocalists, who have taken this vocation with a belief that they possess sufficient talent to place themselves at the very top of the profession.

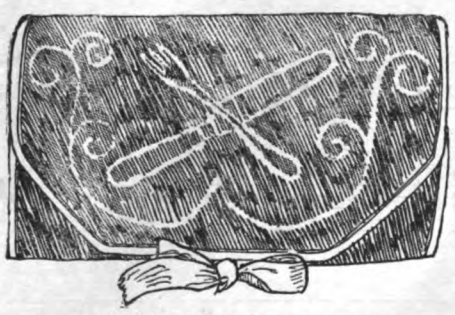
These that are so carried away with themselves are destined to failure and a life of discontent because of their surroundings, and that they will fail to shine above others as they expected to.

To the other class who stand debating the question of the future we would point out that no one who is afraid of hard work, long hours and constant effort should select this profession. No matter how high and grand your ideas may be there can be no success unless you take a practical view and realize that in the musical as in every other profession success only comes after toil and sacrifice.

To those possessing a fair amount of talent combined with a love of the art and willingness to work, the musical profession is as every other one, a place where all may succeed moderately; but where but few can hope to possess the genius to attain the dazzling heights of the very pinnacle of musical fame.



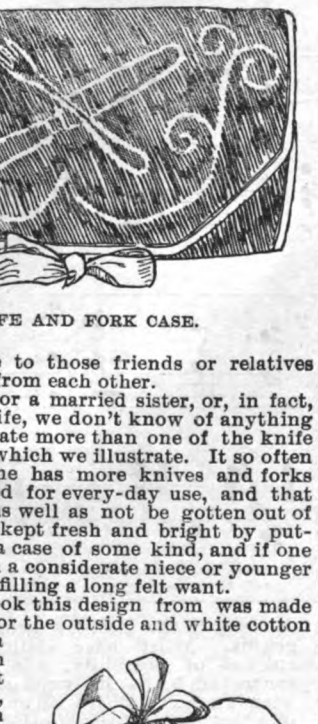
WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.



THE sharp, frosty weather reminds us of the near approach of Christmas, and we are able to give one or two new ideas for those of you who are making inexpensive remembrances for your friends.

Unless one has a well-filled purse the presents must needs be inexpensive, otherwise it would take all of one's allowance for the twenty or twenty-five presents which are necessary to go the rounds of one's immediate family, relatives and a few close friends—and this is putting the number very low.

It is a good idea, when remembrances are to be given to people who do not live in the same house, to get hold of some new and useful articles, either for decoration, the toilet table or for wearing purposes, and to make several of the same thing,—as material can be bought in quantities much more reasonably than when only enough for one of the articles is to be made—and give to those friends or relatives who live apart from each other.



KNIFE AND FORK CASE.

For an aunt, or a married sister, or, in fact, for any housewife, we don't know of anything she will appreciate more than one of the knife and fork cases which we illustrate. It so often happens that one has more knives and forks than are needed for every-day use, and that some may just as well as not be gotten out of the way and be kept fresh and bright by putting them into a case of some kind, and if one is received from a considerate niece or younger sister it will be filling a long felt want.

The one we took this design from was made of blue denim for the outside and white cotton flannel for a lining. Both pieces were cut of the same size, being eighteen inches wide by twenty-four inches long. The two pieces should be laid together wrong side out and seamed up on two sides and one end and then turned right side out by means of the unsewed end. Then the sides are laid over toward the center to a depth of three and a half inches on each side; the open end should have the corners clipped off, and the whole should be bound with a white cotton braid or tape. The pockets are then to be stitched at such distances apart as will give twelve pockets for sticking the knives and forks into. The cotton flannel, of course, comes against the silver and so keeps it bright and free from scratches. It should fold three times, and on the outside end of the one we here illustrate, is embroidered in white linen floss a conventional design with a knife and fork incorporated. A piece of the tape, or a piece of ribbon should be sewed onto the end of the case, and also one at that point farther down on the outside of the case where the last fold comes, so that the case may be fastened in place after it is folded. The entire expense of such a case would not exceed twenty-five cents, if one bought enough of the denim, flannel, tape and linen floss for six.

PIN CUSHION.

The black leg which we show will puzzle our readers until they read the description and use of it. It is intended as a pin cushion to hang on a gentleman's chiffonniere—but is equally appropriate on a lady's dressing table. It is made of black china silk and is eight inches long. It is simply two pieces of the silk cut out, stitched together on the machine, turned and stuffed with bran, very hard. It is stuffed from the top, which is left open, and after it is packed as full as possible, the top is gathered and fastened securely. Then around this top is sewn a double ruffle of chiffon, and a bow of ribbon with one long loop for hanging purposes, is tacked on the last thing. The chiffon, or silk for the ruffle is, when doubled, about three or four inches deep, and quite full, and falls over the knee. The one we show has a yellow ruffle and yellow ribbon.

Another picture shows a pair of pants. You really cannot call them trousers. Pants is the name for them. They are made of denim, cut like a regular overall, with four buttons on the band and some suspenders made from white cotton tape attached thereto. They are supposed to be ornamental—they certainly are useful—not in the usual way, as they are only seven inches long, but in saving the wall paper from being ruined by careless people who think it is put upon the walls simply and solely for the purpose of being scratched with matches. For the benefit of these people two squares of sand paper are pasted onto the seat of the garment, and upon the sandpaper is an interesting text to be read carefully and to be remembered, when going up the stairs to bed, each night thereafter—and so save the wall paper and likewise their own trousers, for the legend says:

MATCH SCRATCHER.

"Scratch your matches on these breeches.
'Twill save your Mother lots of stitches."

It is suggested to present such gifts to boy cousins and young brothers, to be hung under the gas jet in their room.

HOW SOME OF OUR READERS CAN MAKE MONEY.

Last month I cleared, after paying all expenses, $355.85; the month previous $260 and have at same time attended to other duties. I believe any energetic person can do equally as well, as I have had very little experience. The Dish Washer is just lovely, and every family wants one, which makes selling very easy. I do no canvassing. People hear about the Dish Washer, and come or send for one. It is strange that a good cheap washer has never before been put on the market. The Iron City Dish Washer fills this bill. With it you can wash and dry the dishes for a family of ten in two minutes without wetting the hands. As soon as people see the Washer work they want one. You can make more money and make it quicker than with any other household article on the market. I feel convinced that any lady or gentleman can make from $10 to $14 per day around home. My sister and brother have started in the business and are doing splendid. You can get full particulars by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Company, 110 Station A, Pittsburg, Pa. They help you get started, then you can make money awfully fast.

FEEL YOUR PULSE

Place your finger on your pulse and see if your heart beats regularly and steadily. If there is a single skipping or irregularity of the beats, your heart is weak or diseased, and there is no telling how soon it will stop beating altogether. Heart troubles, dangerous as they are, can be instantly recognized by all. No doctor can tell better than you if your heart is out of order. But remember that irregular or skipping beats are only one symptom, and in many cases are not found. Any of the following are just as positive and sure:—

Symptoms of Heart Trouble.

Fluttering, Palpitation, Shortness of Breath, Tenderness, Numbness or Pain in the Left Side, Arm or Under the Shoulder Blade; Fainting Spells, Dizziness, Hungry or Weak Spells; Spots Before the Eyes; Sudden Starting in Sleep, Dreaming, Nightmare, Choking Sensation in Throat; Oppressed Feeling in Chest; Cold Hands and Feet; Painful to Lie on Left Side; Drowsy, Swelling of the Feet or Ankles (one of the surest signs), Neuralgia Around the Heart. Persons having even one of these symptoms should not delay treatment a single day.

Medicine Free to All. If you have been treating yourself for stomach, lung, kidney or nervous disease, and have failed to find a cure, the chances are 9 in 10 that your trouble is in your heart. Hundreds of such cases are found every year. I want you to send me your name and address at once, so I can send to you for trial a box of my celebrated Heart Tablets absolutely free of charge, by mail, prepaid. Don't fail to write me if you have a single one of the above symptoms. I can cure you beyond any question, and will send the free tablets to prove it to you personally. Delays are dangerous. Inclose stamp for postage.

A HALF MILLION
$1.00 Charts Sent FREE With 184 Songs.
EASY MUSIC CHEAP.
COMFORT'S NEW CHART of CHORDS for the PIANO.
A New and Quick Method of Learning to Play the Piano or Organ Without a Teacher.

There have been many so-called easy methods and charts devised, but this is the latest and best. It is intended for those who have not the time to take lessons. A complete self-instructor, enabling any one to play the piano or organ at sight. This chart is the practical result of years of study by a noted American composer and musician. With this chart any one can become an expert pianist, playing accompaniments to the most difficult songs at sight, as well as dance music, marches, etc. These charts are valuable to the advanced musician as well as to the beginner, embracing nearly every major and minor chord used in music. It is the most comprehensive yet simplest chart ever published, and is endorsed by teachers and musicians everywhere.

To introduce "COMFORT'S CHART" in every home, we will send free with each chart the "GIANT ALBUM OF SONGS," containing 184 Songs with words and music, including the great New York hits, Dear Old New Hampshire Hills, Ma Sugar Babe "Coon song", If Mother Were Only Here, For the Flag I Die Dear Mother, all new, as well as all the favorite old ones, such as Molly Bawn, Annie Laurie, I Cannot Sing The Old Songs, Blue Bells of Scotland, Battle Cry of Freedom, John Anderson, My Jo, Danube River, Larboard Watch, Bonnie Dundee, Our Flag is There, Auld Lang Syne, etc., etc.

You Learn in a Moment What it Takes a Teacher Months to Explain to You.

EIGHT LARGE CHARTS 5x18 INCHES EACH.

PRICE OF CHARTS ALONE $1.00. These charts were sold for $1.00 each, but having contracted for half a million of them we got them at a lower rate and we are going to give the Great Album of Songs with each set and have them sold for 25 cents, and to every one selling six sets of charts with the six Albums of Songs at 25c. per set $1.50 in all, we will give one of these Solid Gold shell Opal Rings, warranted to wear over three years. A written guarantee going with the rings from the manufacturers.

SPECIAL OFFER LIMITED TO COMFORT SUBSCRIBERS.

This offer, calling as it does for the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars in sending out such a large quantity of valuable goods on sale, the item of postage and express being enormous, must be limited to "COMFORT" subscribers and we make you these special terms. Send us only 10 cents for a six months' special subscription to Comfort and we will send free, all charges paid, the set of Charts and Chords, Album of Songs, Subscription blanks, etc., etc., and when you sell the Six Sets send us $1.40 balance and we forward your Premium free. If you do not want a Ring we give Ladies' or Gent's Watches, Bracelets, Necklaces, Tea Sets, Lamps, Shaving Sets, etc., as per Premium list we will send you.

FREE WITH OPAL RING.

NO RISK. If after getting the Charts and Album of Songs you are not satisfied, or can't sell them, you can return to us and we will refund the 10c. advanced for subscription. You will then have the privilege of trying the Chart and singing the songs any how free. Enclose 10 cents to-day and send at once to Snap Shots at Famous Boston Writers.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

MARGARET DELAND.

WHILE perhaps no other American city contains so many literary workers as Boston, it cannot be said that any distinctly literary colony exists there. The homes of the men and women who are famous the world over for what they have written, are scattered all over the city and the suburbs. Some still cling to the houses in which a lifetime has been spent, regardless of the fact that a shifting population has left them in a hopelessly unfashionable neighborhood. Others have moved on with the tide into Beacon street and Commonwealth Avenue, while still others have left the city entirely for quieter if less convenient country homes.

Thomas Bailey Aldrich lives in a big old house on Mt. Vernon street, that most unique of all Boston's thoroughfares. Running directly over the top of Beacon Hill, parallel to Beacon street and next to it, thoroughly plebeian at both ends of its short length, there still remains a little space in the middle of Mt. Vernon street which may be reckoned among the most exclusive residence portions of Boston.

It is just there that Mr. Aldrich lives, his house one of a row set well back from the street, with that rare thing in the center of Boston, a big yard in front. The house inside, in its finish and its furnishings, reminds one of the exquisite literary art of the occupant. Quaint old tables and chairs, cabinets, bronzes, pictures, fit each in its place as perfectly and easily as does each word in the sentences which Mr. Aldrich writes.

Margaret Deland lives on the opposite side of Mt. Vernon street and a little below Mr. Aldrich. Her home is a bright modern house, filled with books—books everywhere. The part of the house which pleased me most was the enormous brick fireplace in the great sitting hall, a fireplace so big that a good sized family could sit in semi-circle before it.

Mrs. Deland, whose portrait is given in our initial, is a woman still young, although she has achieved so much in literature, handsome, and, what is not invariably the case with literary women, always becomingly gowned. At rare intervals she consents to read or speak before a public audience, and the occasions when she does so are always notable. She spoke from the pulpit of one of the great city churches in Boston, one Sunday evening not long ago, upon "The Modern Novel." Her voice is singularly well fitted for public speaking, being sweet, clear, and although never forced, easily strong enough to fill a large audience room.

Mrs. James T. Fields lives on Charles street, in a part of the city which has degenerated faster, perhaps, than any other. Noisy electrics rattle in the narrow street. Stables and harness shops, bakeries and Chinese laundries, are near neighbors. Almost every other house on the street has "Rooms to Let" in the window. And yet no one who has been in the house, or knows anything of its history, wonders that Mrs. Fields prefers it to any other house in the world. Probably no other house in Boston has entertained so many distinguished people, and though since the death of Mr. Fields the number has been somewhat lessened the house still keeps up its reputation. Among those who have been entertained there lately were Dr. Watson (Ian Maclaren), and his wife, for whom Mrs. Fields spread that novelty for them, a genuine New England Thanksgiving dinner.

Once inside the Fields' house and noisy Charles street and the city are forgotten, for back of the house, and opening from the dining-room, a beautiful high-walled garden stretches down to where the Charles river, here almost a lake, opens up a vista to the west, where, at sunset, the spires of Cambridge are outlined against the glowing sky.

One of the chiefest treasures of the house is the famous crayon portrait of Hawthorne, made from life. This hangs on the wall of the dining-room and looks down upon a massive old black oak table and queer high-backed chairs.

THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH.

Herbert D. Ward and Mrs. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps Ward live in summer in a delightful house in Gloucester, set out on the rocks where the blue waters of Massachusetts bay almost wash the door sill. In winter their home is in a big, comfortable, modern house in a quiet part of Newton, some ten miles from Boston. Few literary families work under more favorable conditions, and few do as good work. Each has his and her own study, with only the hall between. The rooms are light and cheerful and each furnished in accordance with the tastes of its occupant. Mr. Ward has the reputation, and deserves it, of being one of the handsomest literary men Boston has ever known. Mrs. Ward has been ill much of the time of late and doing almost no work, a fact which has been a great disappointment to those of her friends who knew what her plans were. Mrs. Ward is seen very little in the social life of the city, but those who are privileged to see her in her home know her to be one of the most sweet and charming, as she is one of the most brilliant of women.

Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton's home is a comfortable roomy house on Rutland Square, where the foremost woman writer of verse in America to-day has gathered around her a remarkable collection of pictures and books which are tokens of love and remembrance from the many celebrated people whom she has known. Mrs. Moulton's collection of gift volumes with autograph dedications is particularly large and interesting. Mrs. Moulton always spends her summers abroad, but her Friday afternoons, through the winter, are among the most notable of the social functions. Mrs. Moulton is one of the literary women who knows how to dress well, a faculty which her yearly visits to Paris assist her to exercise.

which she returned whenever possible, and the one in which the last year of her life was spent, was a big old house in Hamilton, some twenty miles out of Boston.

It is a very generally received impression that this spirited writer's real name was Mary Abigail Dodge, and that she obtained her famous nom-de-plume by taking the last syllable of her middle name and the name of her native town. I have the authority of her surviving sister, Miss H. A. Dodge, however, for saying that this is entirely unfounded. Her sister's name, Miss Dodge says, was Mary Abby Dodge, and the name of Abigail which was so persistently ascribed to her was extremely distasteful.

Miss Dodge at home was the most charming hostess imaginable, her converstion sparkling with that wit which enlivened her writings, while her manner was kindliness itself. The last year of her life was a quiet one, for she was nearly helpless from illness. The inaction, the feeling of being "out of things" for one who had been for so long a time "in the midst," must have been hard to bear, but I never heard her make but one allusion to it, and that, it seemed to me, was a strikingly pathetic one. She had been speaking of some work on which she had been engaged which was especially interesting to her, and said:

"And now I can only sit in a nook of sunshine and play with two little black and white kittens." A moment later, though, the happier side of her nature asserted itself, and she added: "After all, though, I never before in all my life had all the time I wanted to play with kittens."

Hezekiah Butterworth has lived for over twenty years on Worcester street. He was for many years one of the editors of the Youth's Companion, but gave that up a few years ago to devote himself to miscellaneous writing. He has several series of boys' books under way, and his stories of New England life, in the writing of which he has no superior, are to be found in all the leading publications.

HEZEKIAH BUTTERWORTH.

Mr. Butterworth is devoting much time at present to a study of educational questions, particularly as pertaining to kindergarten work. He is a very careful student, and thinks nothing of going to Europe or South America to consult an authority. Recently he made a unique and extremely interesting journey across the Andes on mule back, going from Argentine to Chili. Some of the results of this trip have been given to the public through the Review of Reviews, and a more lengthy account has appeared in book form. Although Mr. Butterworth spends most of his time in Boston he owns the historic old farm and farmhouse of his family, down on the Rhode Island coast, and also an orange grove and cottage in Florida.

Julia Ward Howe's Boston home is a house in the most stylish part of Beacon street. Mrs. Howe also has a house at Newport, where she spends the summers. The Boston house is full of interesting objects, many of them of great historic value. I think that of all, the one which has interested most is the helmet which Byron wore during that Grecian war in which he lost his life. Dr. Ward, a Boston man of wealth and cultivation, became greatly interested in the struggle and went, as Byron did, to personally take part in it. During the time he was there he came to know Byron well, and after the latter's death his helmet was given to his American fellow soldier. The helmet is of bronze, beautifully wrought, and though tall and elaborate is not heavy enough to be burdensome. I enjoyed the privilege of trying it on, and when I did so shut my eyes and imagined for a moment that I could hear around me the clash of arms as Turk met Greek.

Mrs. Howe is so sweet and beautiful it is a benediction simply to be in her presence. I remember once I had occasion to go to ask her opinion for publication upon a great National question which had suddenly startled the country. I found her just returned home from a meeting of some sort, tired, I imagine, and not having had time to read what the papers had published about the matter. On this account she asked to be excused, until I happened to say how much her comment had been wished on this occasion because of her having written the "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

The mention of that famous lyric to her was like wine to a worn out man. Her weariness vanished. Her eyes shone, as she said: "Come back to me at nine o'clock. I will have had the papers read to me by that time and be ready to discuss the question understandingly." And she did.

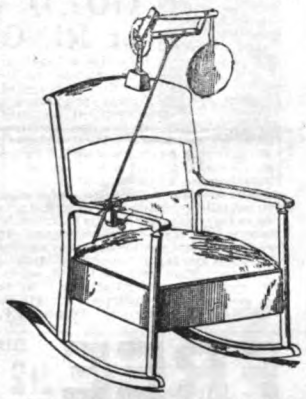
JUST A FEW NEW IDEAS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.



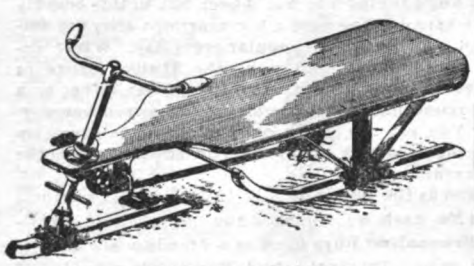
HERE is always a stream of new and interesting ideas flowing through the Patent Office at Washington, and some rather notable ones have gone on record during the last half dozen weeks. Among them one finds a contrivance for making artificial ostrich plumes, which has been originated by E. W. Moch, of New York City. He takes feathers of various smaller and cheaper birds, and puts them together in such an ingenious manner that nobody would suspect the artifice, the result being so fine that no lady need be ashamed to wear the composite ornament on her hat.

Nowadays the making of artificial birds is quite a business. For mourning hats small black parrots are much used, and, inasmuch as there are no such creatures in nature, they have to be manufactured out of defunct love birds, with the aid of dye. For half-mourning millinet black and white are desirable, and for this purpose again art comes to the rescue, turning out a fowl that is a curious mixture, with the gray head of a sandpiper, black wings and tail, and white body. Other birds are made to match costumes, and even hummingbirds are often counterfeited for the same purpose by skillful hands.

James Lyons, of Manchester, Mass., is the inventor of an egg-tester which ought to be a great saver of labor. Most people are acquainted with the ordinary manner of testing eggs, by holding each one for a moment between the eye and a candle, those which are perfectly translucent being declared fresh, while any opacity is a sign of staleness. The machine referred to performs the operation in a wholesale way, and at the same time very quickly, by the help of an endless belt which carries the eggs over a sheet of glass beneath which is a bright light. This light shines through the eggs as they pass over, and the bad ones can readily be picked out.

Interesting to the housewife is a corncob firekindler, patented by Robert Skiles, Wiota, Iowa. The pith being removed, the cob is filled with a mixture of paraffin and turpentine, the open ends being sealed with plaster. Finally, to prevent evaporation, the corncob is coated with heated resin, and it is guaranteed to start a roaring blaze off-hand.

CHAIR AND FAN COMBINATION.



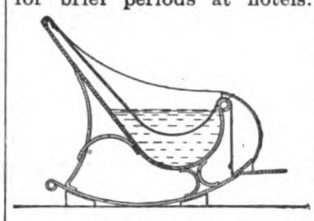
Two new kinds of monuments have been patented within the last month—one of them by Jeff D. Jarrett, of Ketchall, Tenn. It is a sort of artificial stone, with a filling of sand, an envelope of cement, and an outer coat of plaster-of-paris and mucilage. The advantage of this kind of monument is that it is cheap, so that surviving members of a family can afford to put one up for the least lamented relative. The other mortuary novelty is designed by W. A. Hawthorne, of Chittenden, Cal. (See initial.) It is of iron, with an upright piece supporting a horizontal tube which contains the ashes of the late lamented, whose portrait is set in each end of the cylinder. Thus anybody who visits the cemetery has an opportunity not only to read the inscription, but also to ascertain what the deceased looked like.

One of the most recent novelties in artificial stone is the manufacture of marble from chalk. The chalk, which is very porous, is placed in a bath of mineral oxide, which percolates through it and gives it color. It is the same process that nature employs and to which the various colorations of natural marble are due. The slab of chalk is then placed in a bath of liquid silicate, which permeates it in all its parts and cements its particles together. The result is a stone having the hardness and "ring" of real marble, and which is capable of receiving an exquisite polish.

A. R. Miranda of Boston, has invented an antiseptic razor cabinet, in which a man may keep his razors with a certainty that no objectionable germs will get on them. A part of the apparatus is a species of atomizer, with tube and bulb, by the help of which the scientific shaver gives his instruments an occasional spray-bath to disinfect them.

An automobile horse, which can be either ridden or driven, is the invention of a Frenchman named Constance Rousset, who has patented it in this country; it has a movable head by turning which the operator steers the mechanical beast. Its inside works, of course, are machinery, somewhat complicated, and it runs on wheels.

For the sick-room is a novel apparatus by which the patient may be lifted out of his bed and lowered again thereto without being disturbed, pulleys and a sort of net being employed. William L. Walton, of St. Louis, has devised a collapsible chicken-coop, which folds up like an opera hat when not in use. A rocking-chair with a fan attachment, the latter run by a weight, is suitable for old folks, while Johnny may want one of the new-fangled sleds patented by William A. Hartman, of Mayburg, Penn., a picture of which is shown herewith.

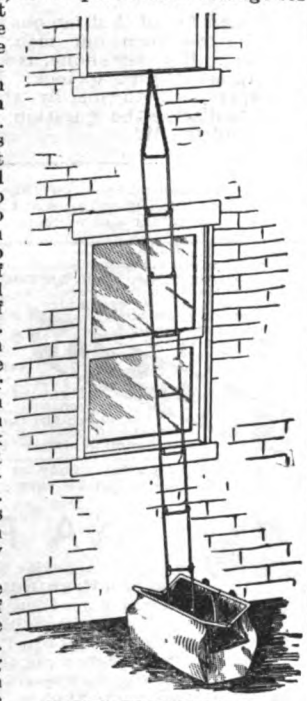


A NEW-FANGLED SLED.

In summer, however, Johnny may prefer to play with a curious toy invented by John T. Davey, of Ashland, Wis. It is a bow and arrow, but the latter, when the bow is sprung, transforms itself in the air into a parachute, which gracefully and slowly descends to the ground. The parachute in its flight upward, becomes detached from the shaft of the arrow, which is fastened to the bow and so does not get away very far.

An ear-drum exerciser is one of the newest inventions, and is supposed to be good for deafness. More interesting is a nut-cracking machine, patented by Edward T. Fenwick, of Washington, D. C. Nowadays the nuts that come to market—especially pecans and English walnuts—are not cracked by hand, because that would be too costly and troublesome a method. Machinery does the work vastly better, submitting each nut to exactly the right amount of pressure, and separating the kernels from the shell beautifully. Afterwards, likewise by an automatic device, the broken kernels are separated from the whole ones.

William Menges of Montgomery, Penn., has contrived a portable fire escape which is recommended for the use of travellers who, whether they like it or not, are obliged to stay for brief periods at hotels. Anybody who possesses this kind of a fire escape need not be anxious, inasmuch as he has only to open his valise and throw it out of the window in the event of an alarm, retaining in his hand the end of the folding ladder which the traveling bag ordinarily contains. The bag serves as an anchor for the ladder at the ground end, while the extremity held by the man at the window is easily attached to the sill, and he is at liberty to descend at his leisure.



CHAIR AND BATH.

Housewives may be interested to learn of a newly-patented process for preserving bread—that is, for keeping bread fresh for a remarkable length of time. Having been baked at a high temperature, the loaves are taken out of the oven, cooled to 90 degrees Fahrenheit, and each of them wrapped as quickly as possible in an air-proof and water-proof paper.

Charles E. Fitzgerald has originated a method of preserving certain meat foods in such a way that they may be kept for a century perhaps without losing any of their freshness or edible quality. He puts them into flasks or other air-tight metal vessels, and subjects them in this condition to a high heat, so as to kill all the bacteria which would otherwise cause decomposition. It has been ascertained by experience that, though bacteria may be killed in this way, their spores are not destroyed; but the inventor keeps the spores from developing by injecting ærated gravy into the receptacles at a pressure of 100 pounds to the square inch. Thus there can be no decay, the vessels being sealed hermetically.

A German named Richard Straube has just patented in this country a combination rocking-chair and bath. It may be used as a hip-bath, or, if desired, it may be tilted at a different angle and employed like any ordinary bath. When it is not wanted for purposes of ablution, the water is simply emptied out of it, and a canvas cover affording a comfortable seat is stretched over it.

There have been a good many inventions lately for preserving the freshness of eggs. At the present time eggs are packed by millions in lime, salt, etc., or are put in cold storage for winter use; but such eggs are very apt to be found unsatisfactory when they come upon the market. Scientific tests have proved that the best of all ways to keep eggs fresh is to pack them in water-glass. To each 10 quarts of boiled water add one quart of water-glass. Pack the eggs in a jar, pour the solution over them, cover them well, keep them in a cool, dark place, and do not wash them before packing. Water-glass is silicate of potash and is extremely cheap.

NOVEL FIRE ESCAPE.

This is an age when all sorts of things are made in sections. Everything imaginable from a rifle to a house is turned out with convertible parts, so that if any portion is missing or broken, a duplicate can be obtained from the factory, guaranteed to fit perfectly. Americans have recently sent a great steel bridge to Gen. Kitchener in the Soudan, in sections, to be put together for spanning a large river. Steamboats are shipped to Africa in sections, carried around the cataracts of the Congo and other mighty rivers, and set afloat upon the waters of the interior of the Dark Continent. The newest thing in this line, however, is what is called the pioneer hut. It is made in a number of pieces, which can be put together by anybody in almost no time, and as easily dismounted and repacked for transport. When packed, it is contained in two boxes of moderate size. The hut is of steel, with a pine floor. It is said to be doing a great deal to further the interests of civilization in South Africa, inasmuch as by its help a whole town may be made to spring up literally in a single night. Furniture in the shape of folding beds, chairs and tables, with stoves and chimney supplied to order, complete a readily-transportable household equipment.

Max Bals, of Vienna, has just patented in the United States a machine for making matches out of pasteboard. The electric typewriter has come at last, and it may revolutionize the art of letter-writing. What the inventors seem to be after most urgently just at present, however, is some kind of practical apparatus that will get power from the tides or the sea-waves, and there is no doubt that they will solve the problem some day and harness this energy to machinery.

TWO OF THE GREATEST WATCHES ON EARTH

$1 Down

Here is a chance to make money. A solid gold watch that can be bought for $12, sells at sight for $28, and one for $15 sells for $40. Something new we are putting on the market. One jeweler in a small town sold 27 in less than a week. The biggest value ever offered by any house in America. We are handling the entire output of these cases. The lady's is the regular six size Solid Gold heavily ornamented with 22K Gold in tints. In the back is set quite a good size Diamond. The movement is a seven jeweled nickled damaskeened Waltham with patent Breguet hairspring. Retail price $28. My price $12. The gents' is made either Hunting or open face exactly like cut with 15 jeweled Waltham movement. Retail price $40. My price $15. This statement may seem incredible to some skeptical dealers, nevertheless it is true, and we will forfeit One Hundred Dollars if either one can be duplicated for the price. One or both will be sent to you for examination if you will forward one dollar to insure express charges which amount will be deducted from the price. Two great establishments. Address whichever is most convenient for you.

A $5.00 SHAVING SET FOR ONLY $1.49.

OR SENT FREE FOR A CLUB OF FOUR.

The average man saves about twenty-five dollars a year by shaving himself and by having a good outfit, you can take comfort enough and save dollars enough to carry you over many rough places in life. We have tried to get up a practical shaving outfit for many years, but the expense of fitting out a suitable case of bang-up A No. one tools has been so great that not until a visit to Norway and Sweden revealed the fact that Swedish Razors were now the best in the world and the makers were anxious to prove it to the American people could we do so. Thus we bargained for a large lot of the best quality at very low figures. By getting the goods from different countries and buying in large lots, we have made up a case of great value at very small cost. These outfits come packed in cases eight inches long, six inches wide and five inches high. The combination consists of 1 Royal Steel Swedish Razor, single value $3.00; 1 Genuine, Horsehide, Double, Reversible, Canvass-back, Nickle-hung, Ebonized Handle Razor Strop, value $1.00; 1 Real China Shaving Mug; 1 Cake Star Shaving Soap; 1 Best Bristle, large handle Lather Brush; 1 Cake Perfumed Lump Magnesia; 1 Stick rich perfumed Cosmetic—making a grand $5.00 combination, all packed in a compact case ready for shipment. We estimated that nearly every man in the country out of necessity shaves himself at some time or other during each month and one long wait in a barber shop sometimes costs more than this whole outfit is valued at. Every man should have an outfit in the house for emergency's use at all events and we have thus got it together at a low cost so as to be able to offer the best articles at the lowest cost. Every woman should see to it that either her Father, her Husband, her Brother or her Sweetheart has one of these outfits. They make the best presents one can give to a gentleman, and you can get one free as follows: SPECIAL HOLIDAY PREMIUM OFFER. Send a club of four yearly subscribers to this paper at 25c. each and we will send an outfit, all charges paid; or send $1.49 in cash and we deliver it free—extending your subscription one year. (CONTINUED FROM PAGE 19.)

ration, the mountain stream gives to the peasant a bountiful gift, for in falling, the water deposits much waste rock material on the edge of the fiord which in time becomes a fertile delta plain covered with rich grass and capable of feeding herds of cattle. It is a strange sight to see, far above the water, a lonely hut perched on the brink of the cliff, and a toy-like cow or a couple of children playing on the grass by the cottage. Often these hanging homes can be reached only by a steep ascent from the water below. In this country such land would be abandoned as useless, but there it is held for generations by one family who are lords of it all as truly as though it were an ancient castle.

The peasants of Norway are thrifty and intelligent and most of them have a very flattering opinion of America. The men are strong and well built and the women are pleasing to look upon with their high white caps, their bright kerchiefs and bodices, above plain, full, woolen skirts and wooden shoes.

The northern portion of Norway has an extremely cold climate and there is but little vegetation beyond lichens and moss. Here live the strange little people of Mongolian type, the Lapps. Their great wealth is in reindeer, the wealthiest often owning herds of a thousand. The Lapps wander about from place to place, living a simple nomadic life, and almost entirely out of the pale of civilization.

Along the coast of northern Norway the cod fishing is an important industry, and every man of the settlement makes the best of the short season and the villages are deserted by the male population.

It is interesting to compare Norway and Greenland. Situated in the same latitude, one is covered with an unmelting sheet of ice, the other is visited by continual rain and fog. Greenland is buried under snow and ice all the year (except a narrow strip along the coast), and scarcely a tree is to be seen in the whole great land, while Norway is covered with forests of pine and orchards of fruit trees. So mild is it at Hammerfest, the most northern town of Norway, that the stream never freezes and yet 60,000 square miles of Scandinavia is within the polar zone. The mildness is, of course, due to the Gulf Stream which flows from the warm waters of the equator carrying warmth to the cold north. Were it not for this warm current the fiords of Norway would be filled with ice like those of Greenland, and the country would be uninhabitable, perhaps covered with a great ice sheet.

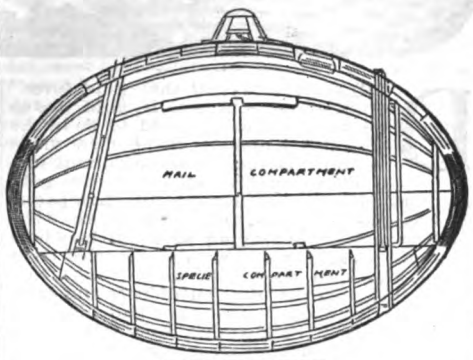
But the glory of Norway is its midnight sun. Imagine a day reaching round to the day again. Think of watching the sun move about the sky and not set, shining above the horizon at midnight like a belated traveler, lost on the path of the sky. At North Cape, far in the north of Norway, this scene may be witnessed and the trip thence is growing more popular each year. In all parts of Norway the days are very long in summer, the sun setting far into the evening. But then again comes the dark cold days of winter when for many months the sun is scarcely seen at all. To the people of the temperate zone it is hard to realize that this wonder is no wonder to the Norwegians, but as ordinary an affair as the coming of spring or the changing color of the leaves in the autumn.

The Norwegians are the descendants of those early Norsemen, those Vikings of old who sailed seas far and wide in open boats, conquering where they went. Much of the strength of the English speaking people may be attributed to their Norse ancestors, the Vikings, who descended from the cold land of the North with the music of the falls in their ears, and the memory of the rugged mountains always before them, and wherever they conquered they left the stamp of their own characters.

The Anderson Ellipsoid Safe Float.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE wreck of the Elbe is yet fresh in the minds of the people, with its loss of hundreds of lives and the millions in gold which it carried, together with its hundreds of mail pouches. It is to prevent such enormous losses of precious metal and mail matter that there is being built by the Cramps a device which is in reality the grand evolution of the corked bottle thrown over at sea bearing a message from some wrecked vessel.



Josiah B. Anderson, the inventor of this device, was seen at his home recently and the plans and workings were fully explained.

"When I learned of the sinking of the Elbe," said Mr. Anderson, "I determined that if it was impossible to devise a means of saving the passengers at such a time, that I would contrive to invent a way of saving the mails and valuables. This safe float is the result of five years' thought and labor.

"This device, as the name indicates, is made in the shape of an egg; twenty-two feet long, fourteen feet wide and fourteen feet deep. It is to rest in a cradle on the after deck of the great ocean liners, from which it cannot be moved until, in case of shipwreck, the water comes about it as the ship goes down; then of its own buoyancy it floats until sighted and towed into port.

"Each float is, in reality, a mammoth safe. The outside armor is of the best nickel-plated steel, two inches in thickness; within this plate is a layer of asbestos; one of cork; one of asphaltum; and within all, an inside plate of steel; the whole making a shell ten inches thick. Thieves can no more effect an entrance to this float than they can crack a bank vault; it is fire, water and burglar proof.

"The instant the float touches the water, several means of calling attention to itself are automatically put in operation. A stream of fire, produced by phosphide of calcium, issues from the float to the height of eight feet, and will burn thirty days. An electric light burning white in fair weather and red in fog is lighted; an electric bell which can be heard three miles rings constantly, and the international flag of distress is hoisted.

SECTIONAL VIEW.

"The float," continued Mr. Anderson, "is divided into three compartments; one for the mail, which will hold from six hundred to fifteen hundred pouches; another for the carrying of specie, which will stow away between eight and nine million dollars in gold; and a third containing the machinery and storage for valuables of the passengers.

"The amount of precious metals used to settle international alliance is astounding to the average person unfamiliar with banking. In one week in May, 1897, over seven million dollars in gold was exported from New York; hundreds of millions are sent across the ocean every year; gold flows in when we are selling more to Europe than we are buying and flows out again when the reverse is the case. My invention carries these vast sums absolutely without danger of loss, at once interesting banking-houses and winning their patronage. The requirements for the mail service are: 'by the most economic, quickest and safest method;' thus all governments will be forced to use the Ellipsoid. Passengers carry thousands of dollars worth of valuables with them when they cross the water and will make use of the float's rented boxes. In every way will the float meet the demands of the world.

"The cost of each float is nineteen thousand six hundred dollars. A company is ready to do business, with a capital of fifteen million dollars behind it.

"The first float," said Mr. Anderson, in closing, "will make its maiden trip sometime in the early part of next year. We feel that nothing will occur which can disturb the plans and expectations of the company; the government's Naval Architect, Arthur B. Cassidy has approved and endorsed the Ellipsoid, and there is as much certainty of the float floating and proving a success as there is certainty of one of the United States' warships floating when it slips into the water from the stocks."

ORIGIN OF THE LOVING CUP.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE loving cup now so much used for prizes, had its origin, it is stated by Lord Lyon, British Ambassador at Paris, in an incident that occurred to King Henry of Navarre. While hunting one day he became separated from his companions and being thirsty, stopped at an inn for wine. The maid who handed it to him as he sat on his horse, neglected to present the handle. Some of the wine was spilled and the King's white gauntlets were spotted. The thought occurred to him while riding home, that a two-handled cup would prevent a repetition of this annoyance, so he had a two-handled cup made at the royal potteries and sent to the inn. On his next visit, when he again called for wine, what was his astonishment to behold the maid (who had received instruction from her mistress to be very careful of the King's cup) presenting it to him, holding it carefully by each of the handles. At once the happy idea struck him of a cup with three handles, which was promptly acted upon, as his majesty quaintly remarked: "Surely, out of three handles I shall be able to get one." Hence the loving cup.

HERE is a chance for the "short-story" writer. Instead of wasting time, stationery, stamps and temper in trying to get his wares accepted by the current publications, let him learn the Japanese language and betake himself and his fertile brain to the Flowery Kingdom, where public story tellers still earn fabulous sums by plying their art.

The Magical Sponge differs from the ordinary sponge in nature, while the common sponge is of vegetable origin and found in the ocean, the Magical Sponge is a mineral production and found in the United States, dug from the ground, carefully prepared and manufactured into sponges for the Housekeeper, Merchant, Liveryman, Metal Workers, and all persons who desire to keep their homes, offices, and business places in a clean and healthy condition.

No Soap or water is needed or even used with the Magical Sponge for Cleaning Windows or any outside Metal. In the winter time it has no equal, it does not freeze, and no water being used (other than what is in the sponge) all trouble and hard work is avoided. For Cleaning Baseboards, Window Sills, Wainscoating and painted surfaces, it acts like a charm; takes all the finger marks, spots, grease and dirt away, leaving a Clean, Polished Surface.

Good men wanted all over the country to handle these goods, big inducements offered steady workers, and exclusive sale. To Agents, Salesmen, and house to house canvassers, who send us 25 cents for a 6 months' subscription, we will send one sample post paid, and make them a business proposition. Write at once. THE JERUSALEM CHAMBER.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

The room in which a king died, and a Bible was written.

THE Jersualem Chamber! There are few rooms in the world today to which the student of the Bible turns with more interest, few in which more varied associations linger. Built more than 600 years ago as the "withdrawing room" of the stately mansion which was the home of the Abbot of Westminster, it is still a part of the Dean's residence, and one of the most interesting adjuncts of Westminster Abbey.

The picture given with this article, of the magnificent west front of Westminster Abbey, shows the exterior of the Jerusalem Chamber, a square time-crumbled structure joined to a corner of the Abbey and just at the right of the great west doors which open only to royalty itself and to the ducal house of Northumberland. In this dark old room a king of England was laid upon the floor to die. Around the long oak table in the center of the room sat, many years ago, that body of godly men who compiled the Westminster catechism. Around the same table in our time gathered for their momentous work the eminent scholars who gave us the revised Bible.

Most visitors to Westminster never see the inside of the Jerusalem Chamber. They either wander about the Abbey alone, lost among a wilderness of monuments of fascinating history, or else they pay sixpence to be guided with a lot of other tourists through the so-called "royal" part of the Abbey. The verger who is the guide rattles off a cut-and-dried history of the most famous tombs, and then politely tells his company to "march on," and out. I found I couldn't ask a fraction of the questions I wanted to, and so when our verger-guide bowed my party out I hung back until I was last, and asked him if he had any spare time to himself during the day. The vergers are men employed to be in attendance in the Abbey. The name comes from a French word meaning "rod" because many years ago they carried a rod. Now they carry no rod, but wear a long black gown. This one was a young man, and unusually intelligent. He told me he had two hours to himself that afternoon, and I hired him for a few shillings to give them to showing me around alone. Money was never better spent, for besides all I learned that afternoon we became such good friends that afterwards I spent many pleasant and profitable hours there with him. He obtained permission from Dean Bradley to take me into many places into which most visitors are never allowed to go, even to unlocking and taking me inside that superb bronze fence which surrounds the tomb of Henry VII., the central object in that incomparable chapel which is the crowning glory of the Abbey. It was in this way that I came to see so much of the Jerusalem Chamber.

A natural first question is, "Why did the room receive this name?" Probably because the tapestries with which it was decorated represented scenes in the famous city. When Westminster was a palace many of the rooms were fancifully named for the same reason. Such were "Heaven" "Paradise" and the "Antioch Chamber." Even now there is a "Jericho Parlor," but my friend told me he suspected this had received the name these later years, because it is connected with the "Jerusalem Chamber" by such a long, narrow and crooked passage that the vergers had been in the habit of saying to themselves that it was "a Sabbath Day's journey" from one to the other.

Until recently, conservative English ideas of propriety did not provide any means of heating so sacred an edifice as Westminster Abbey, and for the first few centuries of existence the only fire-place in the whole great pile was in this room. Thus it happened that when King Henry IV. was stricken with a sudden fatal illness while praying in the Abbey before the blessed shrine of St. Edward, preparatory to starting on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, he was brought into this room. Of conveniences for such an emergency there were none, and the dying king was laid upon the floor in front of the fire-place, in which a good blaze was hastily kindled. When the monarch rallied from the first attack and asked where he was, he was told, "In the Jerusalem Chamber."

"Laud be to the Father of Heaven," he replied, "for now I know that the prophecy shall be fulfilled."

It seems that some time earlier in his life it had been foretold to King Henry that he should "die in Jerusalem." Satisfied that this was the decree of fate he sank back upon the floor and died.

It is interesting to know that when the Assembly of Divines met here in 1643 it was because they, too, were driven here by the cold. Their sessions were begun in the stately Henry VII. Chapel, but they were glad to move into the less pretentious but more comfortable smaller room. Since then there have been many memorable meetings there. In 1624, in the reign of James I., Lord Keeper Williams, Dean of Westminster, gave a great banquet there to the French ambassadors who had crossed the Channel to conclude the negotiations for the marriage of Princess Henrietta Maria to the Prince of Wales who was later to become Charles I. Even now there are carved wooden heads on each side the mantel over the famous fire-place, which represent this royal and unhappy couple.

Speaking of kings and queens and Westminster, I ought not to pass by the royal doors with the bare mention which I have given them. I say pass by, advisedly, for no common person passes through. These doors are in the center of the west front, between the two great towers, and almost crowded as can be seen, by the "Jerusalem Chamber." Although really the main entrance, the thousands of visitors to the Abbey go and come through "Solomon's Porch," a side door at the entrance to the north transept. Only for the sovereigns of the kingdom were the western doors opened, until, many years ago, a Duke of Northumberland did his monarch some such signal service that to him and his family was granted this royal prerogative.

CLIPPING BUREAUS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

IT is now but eighteen years since a man with only fifty cents in his pocket was trying to devise some way to increase it. He observed an artist who had just completed a picture eagerly buying and paying large sums for late newspapers containing criticisms of his work, and the thought came to him that if people desired such things they would probably be willing to pay for having them collected and delivered; so he invested his fifty cents in a stock of old newspapers, and set about the clipping, assorting and sale of their contents. To-day 50,000 persons and $50,000,000 are engaged in the business of making and distributing newspaper clippings. There are between fifty and one hundred bureaus in the United States, nearly as many in England and on the continent, besides others at various places in Australia, China, South Africa, and South America, many of them being international. In this country six such bureaus have recently consolidated and capitalized their joint undertaking at $5,000,000.

Railway companies, telegraph lines, and express companies have recently ceased subscribing to these bureaus and have gone into the business on their own account, ordering their local agents to clip and file away every item concerning their affairs which should come in their way, and send the clippings to the main office. There they are classified and stored away, and often prove a mine of wealth to their owners.

Clipping bureaus are not all devoted to indiscriminate scissoring; many of them are specialists, and devote themselves solely to one class of items. Some are confined strictly to literary matters. These not only furnish criticisms and reviews of all new books and magazine articles but they provide the latest literary intelligence of every kind, and hence are of much use to the busy writer who desires to be kept abreast of the times in the literary world, but which would involve, were it not for the clipping bureau, hours spent daily in going over the columns of the newspapers and magazines. Five dollars per hundred is the price asked for such clippings, unless a special arrangement has been made with the bureau for the year.

W. T. Stead, a most prolific writer, and at present the editor of the Review of Reviews in London, has, it is said, three rooms filled with his scrap books of literary clippings, and it was through the reading of these that the idea was first evolved of the American Review of Reviews, which he first issued in 1891, and which has, in these few years, attained a high place among magazines.

W. D. Howells depends largely upon clipping bureaus to furnish the incidents from which his stories are woven, and many another author relies upon them for both plots and incidents.

Other bureaus are devoted to musical and theatrical matters, and are, of course, largely patronized by professional singers and actors, as the people of this class, in common with the rest of man and womankind, desire to know what the world says of them. Duse, in the course of two weeks, is said to have received two thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight personal clippings. Richard Mansfield's order excludes everything except items relating to his own personal playing, and yet his weekly clipping bill frequently amounts to $30.

All the prominent scientific men in Washington are regular subscribers to clipping bureaus, and each of them receives weekly or monthly instalments of clippings referring to his own line of work. He usually has one clerk whose duty it is to see that these are all properly classified, labelled, and arranged in scrap books. In the Geological Survey, for instance, a huge package of clippings from a prominent bureau comes each week to the Chief Clerk of the Survey; his stenographer assorts them into piles and sends them about the building by the messenger. To the geologists go all relating to the structure of the earth or to the mining interests of the country; to the forester goes everything relating to our forests, their destruction or preservation, forest fires, etc.

Medical men, even, have their bureaus from which they can procure all sorts of items relating to the study and practice of medicine and surgery.

The Queen of England and the Prince of Wales have their scrap book, Victoria's being filled for her by others, while her royal son frequently does his own scissoring and pasting. Uncle Sam has long kept scrap books for the use of his Chief Executive, who often finds them very valuable, although rumor has it that Cleveland opened one but once during his last term, and that was during the Venezuelan crisis.

It is said that Uncle Sam's clippings of the Civil War cost him $15,000, but his report of the Spanish-American War, which has just been sent to his archives, will, although it is in twenty large volumes bound in morocco, cost only $1,000, barely the expense of the making; but the bureau man has a duplicate set of the clippings, from the sale of which he hopes to reimburse himself.

Pages might be filled with descriptions of the different kinds of items called for. Their name is legion as the wants of man are numberless, but the bureau man is equal to all the demands made upon him, and the supply is equal to the demand. Edison, Tesla, Graham Bell, Trowbridge, calling for the latest news of electrical appliances, Oliver Iselin for cup races, and Defender's triumphs, the Cramps for shipping news, authors for items to weave into their stories, all are gratified and the world moves on.

DURING the days of the "gold fever" in Melbourne, Australia, gold was as plenty as silver was said to be in the days of Solomon. Some men made as much as four hundred pounds in a single day. Being so plenty gold was wasted lavishly. Bottles of champagne were used as ninepins, and he who broke the smallest number in playing paid for the whole lot used. Champagne was also emptied from the bottles into wash-tubs and drunk from pannikins, with the addition of beer and spirits to give it "body!" One man had his horse shod with gold. Sandwiches were wrapped in banknotes and devoured; silver wrapped in banknotes was thrown to actresses instead of flowers.

Christmas Feasting the World Over.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

WHEREVER Christmas is known and observed the wide world through, feastings seem to make an important part of the festivities. It is an old saying, "the way to a man's heart is through his stomach," but at the Christmas season things seem to be reversed and men's hearts are burning within them to furnish pleasure to the gastronomic organs.

In Sweden, for instance, that snow-covered country, the people look forward to the coming of Christmas with more joy than in almost any other country. For days and weeks the preparations are going on for this greatest event of the year. The brewing must not be forgotten, and the supply of ale must be largely increased, for, besides what is needed for home consumption, there must be enough on hand to admit of offering a mug of it to the many Christmas callers who come laden with gifts and good wishes. White bread must, for this once, take the place of the brown cakes which are the common food of the people. Even the stock receive an extra supply of provender and sheaves of oats and other grain are fastened up in spots where they will be accessible to the wild birds. On Christmas Eve dinner is taken in the kitchen, partly to lighten the evening's work, but chiefly to enable the family to observe the ancient custom of "dipping in the pot." For this, ham, meat, tongue, etc., have been boiled together, and while the pot still hangs over the fire each member of the family takes a slice of bread and tries to dip it completely into the pot and remove it without having it break into pieces. When all have shown their skill the meat is eaten, after which comes rice and apple sauce. Later in the evening the famous Yule dish of codfish and potatoes is brought forth, followed by more rice, cooked as none but Swedes can cook it; but before a grain of this rice can be eaten each person present must recite a rhyme of his or her own composition. These are intended to show off some virtue or foible of some member of the family, and have probably cost their author weeks of work and thought.

In France the Christmas dinner includes the poulet cooked and garnished as only the French can do such things, and liver puddings rich with truffles and seasoning. Spain begins the dinner with a soup of sweet almonds and cream, followed by fish roasted before the fire and basted with lemon, chopped garlic and oil. Russia serves her national soup, which is a mixture of beef bouillion, boiled cabbage, sour cream and the fermented juice of beet roots. This may be had at any time during the entire day. At the dinner itself the principal dish is a pig roasted whole, and served with Casche, which is a dressing made of boiled buckwheat cooked with the liver and the heart of the pig. A relish eaten with this is the Pasca, a cheese creamed with butter, sugar and raisins, and allowed to stand twenty-four hours. And never is missing from this Christmas table the dish of bright-colored, hard-boiled eggs, which are eaten with salt.

The German dinner consists of roast goose, stuffed with chestnuts, pork boiled with sauerkraut, sausages, beef with sour sauce, black puddings, smoked goose, baked apples, and beer in unlimited amount. In Switzerland again goose is the principal dish. This is supplemented by Swiss confectionery, cakes, fruit and nut puddings, Geneva fritters, a paste made of fruits, spices, marmalade, eggs and kirsch. The Italian dinner, which is partaken of at any time in the evening between eight and midnight, boasts of eels as its principal dish. These are served one to each guest, each rolled in a laurel leaf. Portugal follows the lead of Russia in the choice of Christmas dinner, and feasts on sucking pig, while Alsace imitates Germany in its festival dishes.

Bohemia alone, among all the Christain countries, makes Christmas a day of rigorous fasting. Even children are expected to deny themselves all food from sunrise to sunset. This day is also a veritable collection day for workmen of every class, and the master of the house needs a pocketful of money to satisfy all the demands made upon him by the multitudinous artisans, musicians, pot-menders, bell-ringers, chimney-sweeps, cobblers, etc., who throng the house from early dawn to wish him a "Merry Christmas" and receive from him a remembrance.

In the mean time his wife, daughters and maid servants are busy all day long in the kitchen, whence issue odors most tantalizing to the fasting family. Towards sunset the last collector departs, the children are washed and arrayed in their Sunday clothes, the father and hired men quit work and don their best clothing, and the mother, daughters and servants also find time, amid their many duties, to deck themselves in all their finery, for all must be in readiness when the Angelus rings.

The ravishing whiffs from the kitchen are constantly increasing, and when at last the Angelus peals out its welcome summons all fasting is at an end, and the whole family, including servants and hired men, file into the dining-room, and range themselves around the table. All remain standing while the grandfather, if the family is so fortunate as to possess one, asks a blessing upon the food. Then all are seated and the simple but abundant meal begins. The menu is nearly the same throughout Bohemia, and consists of fish soup, gruel boiled with dried mushrooms, butter cakes smeared with prune marmalade, flapjacks with poppyseed or honey, fried or baked carp, hot; cold carp in black sauce, cakes, coffee, nuts and apples.

The supper is interrupted by a succession of roulades and blasts. It is the shepherd blowing his long horn, which is a familiar sound to all the village, and the shepherd himself is a most useful and important personage among these simple folk. He minds not only their sheep but also the swine, and cattle. He understands animal ailments, and is often a friend in need to the farmers when their domestic animals are suffering. So, although his call as collector comes at a most inconvenient hour of the festive day, he is none the less welcome, and is brought to the table and pressed in the kindliest manner to join the meal. His stay is short, however, as he has yet several places to visit, and the day is nearly ended; so he is allowed, somewhat unwillingly, to depart, and his mellow horn goes winding over the hills, growing fainter and fainter as he moves, while the family gather around the fire for an hour of social chat and story-telling. At eleven the older ones make preparations for a journey to the parish church, no matter how great the distance or what the weather, that they may end the day in devout adoration of Him whose birth into the world they have just been celebrating.

The Land of the Dark and the Sunlight.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE very name of Norway suggests everything that is picturesque and romantic, high mountains rising directly out of the sea leaving the deep valleys to be filled with water from the ocean, forming fiords, the long darkness of the winter and the daylight meeting dawn in the summer, the log huts of the peasants together with their gay dress and delightful manner, make the country one which will awaken interest in every lover of the beautiful and artistic.

Norway occupies the western half of the Scandinavian Peninsula and in most things is different from its neighbor, Sweden. In passing from the latter, a country of plateaux and wide plains dotted by hundreds of lakes, to Norway, one is impressed by the immediate change of scenery, for once over the boundary the level land disappears, all is rugged and mountainous.

All along the Atlantic coast the fiords cut deep into the land and wind like rivers for hundreds of miles from the ocean. In ancient geological times Norway was worn down to a level plain which was afterwards raised thousands of feet and the valleys worn out by the glaciers and streams, so that there are no giant mountains towering above their neighbors; but all of Norway is high. The fiords form the great wealth of Norway for it is here that the towns are built, here that the fisheries are carried on, here that vessels find anchorage and trade may prosper. About one eighth of the entire population are accommodated on the islands and the rugged sides of the fiords. For grandeur and beauty the Sogne Fiord excels all others. Extending more than one hundred miles inland, its wall of solid rock rises abruptly to heights of from four to five thousand feet casting a shadow upon the water and lending a sense of security to the traveller who seems entirely shut off from the world, and awed by the grandeur and silence of the scene. But the silence is broken again and again by the splash of the waterfalls from the heights above. Released from the glaciers and the everlasting snows of the mountain tops the water rushes to the edge of the cliffs, there to tumble and dash with a sparkle and spirit which can only be felt, to the fiords below. There is in these streams an animation which is most inspiring, like a spirit telling of great things to be accomplished, and with that sound ever in his ears one does not wonder that the Norwegian has always shown a spirit of unrest and a love of adventure. But beside an inspi-

GENTLEMEN:—In reply to your letter requesting the use of my photograph for advertising purposes, and asking how I am pleased with the work, would say I do not object to you using my photograph as your prices are very low and garments so exact to my measurements that I gladly recommend you. I would add that I have never made less than $80.00 per month since I received your first outfit, and in the best months have made as high as $350.00 per month. Very truly, E. J. DOYLE.
Should you write Mr. Doyle, be sure to enclose a 2c stamp for reply.
We have hundreds of letters similar to Mr. Doyle's.

WE WANT MEN IN EVERY COUNTY in the United States. If your reference is satisfactory we will start you at once. No experience necessary. No capital required. We furnish a full line of samples, stationery, etc. A tailor's-for-the-trade complete outfit ready for business. NO COMMISSION PLAN. You regulate your profits to suit yourself. No house-to-house canvass. This is not one of the many catchy advertisements for agents, but one of the very few advertisements offering a rare opportunity to secure strictly high-grade employment at BIG WAGES.

We are the LARGEST TAILORS in America. We make to measure over 300,000 suits annually. We occupy entire one of the largest business blocks in Chicago. We refer you to the Corn Exchange National Bank in Chicago, any Express or Railroad Co. in Chicago, any resident of Chicago. Before engaging with us, write to any friend in Chicago and ask them to come and see us, then write you if it is a rare opportunity to secure steady, high-class, big-paying employment. BETTER STILL—come to Chicago yourself and see us before engaging and satisfy yourself regarding every word we say. You can get steady work and big pay. Work in your own county 300 days in the year and you can't make less than $5 every day above all expenses. WE WANT TO ENGAGE YOU to take orders for our Made-to-Order-and-Measure Custom Tailoring, (Men's Suits, Pants and Overcoats). We put you in the way to take orders from almost every man in your county; a business better than a store with a $20,000.00 stock. You will have no competition.

WE ARE THE LARGEST TAILORS IN AMERICA
Of Fine Custom-Made Garments. We buy our cloth direct from the largest European and American Mills. We control the product of several Woolen Mills. We operate the most extensive and economic custom tailoring plant in existence, thus reducing the price of Suits and Overcoats made to order to $5.00 and upward; Pants from $1.50 to $5.00. We show a large line of suits at from $5.00 to $8.00. Prices so low that nearly everyone in your county will be glad to have their suits MADE TO ORDER.

WE FURNISH YOU a large, handsome leather-bound book, containing large cloth samples of our entire line of Suitings, Pantaloonings, etc., a book which COSTS US SEVERAL DOLLARS; also Fine Colored Fashion Plates, Instruction book, Tape Measure, Business Cards, Stationery, Advertising Matter, and your name and address on rubber stamp with pad complete. We also furnish you a Salesman's Net Confidential Price List. The prices are left blank under each description so you can fill in your own selling prices, arranging your profit to suit yourself. As soon as you receive your sample book and general outfit and have read our book of instructions carefully, which teaches you how to take orders, and marked in your selling price, you are ready for business and can begin taking orders from every one. At your low prices, business men, farmers and in fact every one will order their suits made. You can take several orders every day at $1.00 to $5.00 profit on every order. EVERY ONE WILL BE ASTONISHED AT YOUR LOW PRICES.

YOU REQUIRE NO MONEY. Just take the orders and send them to us, and we will make the garments within 5 days and send direct to your customers by express C. O. D., subject to examination and approval, at your selling price, and collect your full selling price, and every week we will send you a check for all your profit. You need collect no money, deliver no goods, simply go on taking orders, adding a liberal profit and we deliver the goods, collect all the money and every week promptly send you in one round check for your full profit for the week. NEARLY ALL OUR GOOD MEN GET A CHECK from us of AT LEAST $40.00 every week in the year.

THE OUTFIT IS FREE. We make no charge for the book and complete outfit, but as each outfit costs US SEVERAL DOLLARS, to protect ourselves against many who would impose on us by sending for the outfit with no intention of working, but merely out of idle curiosity, as a GUARANTEE OF GOOD FAITH on the part of EVERY APPLICANT, we require you to fill out the blank lines below, giving the names of two parties as reference, and further agreeing to pay, merely as a temporary deposit, ONE DOLLAR and express charges for the outfit, when received, if found as represented and really a sure way of making big wages. The $1.00 you agree to pay when outfit is received does not begin to pay the cost to us, but insures us you mean business. WE WILL REFUND YOUR $1.00 as soon as your orders have amounted to $25.00, Which amount you can take the first day you work.

Fill out the following lines carefully, sign your name, cut out and send to us, and the outfit will be sent you at once.

AMERICAN WOOLEN MILLS CO., West Side Enterprise Bldg., CHICAGO, ILL.

GENTLEMEN:—Please send me by express, C. O. D., subject to examination, your Sample Book and Complete Salesman's Outfit, as described above. I agree to examine it at the express office and if found exactly as represented and I feel I can make good big wages taking orders for you, I agree to pay the express agent, as a guarantee of good faith, and to show I mean business (merely as a temporary deposit), One Dollar and express charges, with the understanding the One Dollar is to be refunded to me as soon as my sales have amounted to $25.00. If not found as represented and I am not perfectly satisfied I shall not take the outfit or pay one cent.

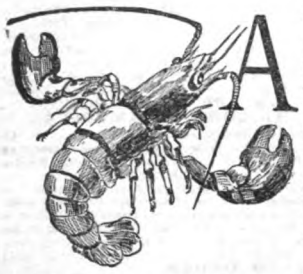
HA! HA! HA! FUN ALIVE!
The Comical Mirror.

A handsome convex mirror in a case suitable for carrying in the pocket. For many years the funniest and most laughable attraction in nearly every museum has been the large convex mirrors in which a person appears drawn out as long and narrow as a bean pole, or flattened down like a gridiron with a face as broad as a cellar door. This mirror produces the same effect as the large and expensive mirrors in the museums.



By holding the mirror in an upright position stout people look thin and in a horizontal position thin people look stout; anyone can recognize themselves at once, but their features are so distorted and their general appearance so changed that they cannot fail to have a good laugh over it. If you have a friend (lady or gentleman) who think they are a little better looking than anyone else, let them take a peep into the mirror and it will take them down a peg or two—either the "short and fat" view or the "long and slim" view are stunners and will cure the blues every time. Send for one it will afford you lots of fun.

GRAND OFFER TO YOU. Send us 12 cents and we will send this splendid literary monthly for the Home, three whole months on a trial subscription and one Comical Mirror, postpaid; for 27 cents we will send you the paper 3 months and three mirrors all paid; or, for only 76 cents we will send the paper a whole year and one dozen mirrors by express Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

ALMOST every one at some time has to entertain a large number of guests,—either at an At Home, a wedding reception, or a tea to introduce some visiting friend, or to usher a daughter into society.

Now when there are a hundred or two to cater for, the question of expense enters largely into the arrangements, with most of us, and where one is obliged to go to a caterer and give an order for every item, this expense is extreme. But if a woman cares to go to the trouble of doing it, she can get up a very delicate and satisfactory lay-out at two-thirds the expense the same refreshment would cost if furnished by a caterer,—and in many cases it would be more satisfactory. Of course this means hard work and great care—but the result often more than pays one for the amount of work expended—and then there is the satisfaction of knowing that at least a third of the expense is thereby saved.

The usual refreshment offered for such occasions is salads, rolls, fancy cakes and ices. Of course this may be made more elaborate by adding a hot course—of croquettes or something of that sort,—but unless it is to be a lunch, in the middle of a very cold day, anything of this kind is not necessary. Instead, one might have hot bouilion, which is easier to prepare and to serve.

Of course one must hire from a caterer extra dishes—plates, glasses for the ice, and possibly, silver; if, therefore, one feels that to make the ices for so large a company is too much to undertake, these may also be ordered from the caterer, thereby saving much work; but almost any one at all familiar with the cooking of dainty dishes would be able to make the mayonnaise dressing for any amount of any kind of a salad that may be decided upon, also the sandwiches or rolls, and cakes. Then, too, almonds may be blanched and salted, also peanuts and pecans, if desired. And don't forget some preserved ginger, which is not only a much-enjoyed dainty to top off with, but is also useful in aiding the digestion. (This can be said of few of the confections one is offered at a lunch.)

We show in our illustration a new salad called the "Admiral." Of course no one could possibly guess for whom it is named! It is the more appropriate as it is concocted of something that loves the ocean.

For this salad the recipe tells us to mix equal parts of finely cut celery and lobster meat cut in dice; pour over this a French dressing, which is made of three tablespoons vinegar to six of olive oil, one-half teaspoon salt and one-fourth cayenne or paprica. If desired, a small quantity of mayonnaise may be added to this—or it may be omitted. Arrange in baskets made from lobster shell, sprinkle with lobster coral, which has been put through the ricer, and garnish with curled celery. The claws of the lobster are used as handles to the baskets. Serve on lettuce leaves. Of course if one is to serve to a large number of people, individual arrangement could not be made, as there would not be shell enough wherewith to form the baskets.

There are some people who think the opening of a lobster is a great undertaking, and therefore have it done at the market before the lobster is brought home; this is quite wrong, as the fresh flavor of the lobster is thereby lost, and there really is very little work in the opening of one. If buying the lobster yourself, be sure to see that the tail curls up stiffly, toward the body, as that shows that the lobster was alive when put into the water to boil.

In opening a lobster, first take off the large and small claws; then break off the tail and cut out the inside shell with scissors, so that the long piece of meat in the tail may be removed without being broken. After being removed, take out the intestinal vein which runs through the centre of it and throw away. This is the only bad part of the lobster. Take out the small pieces of meat in the body where the small claws have been removed by means of a fork. Crack the large claws with a hammer, or they may be cut with heavy scissors, and remove the meat. Use the outer shell of the lobster for the making of the baskets; two may be made of the body shell and one of the tail shell—by trimming them into shape with scissors. (Be sure and don't get the lamp scissors!)

Now for the mayonnaise dressing—as, if one has a chicken salad, or usually, one of lobster, that is the dressing to be used.

Mix one-half teaspoonful each of mustard, salt, and powdered sugar; add the yolks of two eggs and one-half teaspoonful of vinegar. Add gradually three-fourths cup olive oil. As the mixture thickens thin it with vinegar and lemon juice, adding alternately one tablespoonful of each. Now this sounds simple enough, but unless made very carefully it is not always a success. It is exceedingly hard to make it when one is alone, as there should be one to stir and one to pour on the oil, drop by drop, so that separation may not take place and thereby give it a curdled appearance. After the dry ingredients and the eggs and vinegar have been blended by means of a small wooden spoon, this mixture should be stirred continually by one person, while some one else drops in the oil, very slowly, until at least half the oil has gone in; then it can be put in faster; as it thickens, the vinegar and lemon juice must be added very slowly, for the same reason that the oil is.

This dressing will keep for weeks, if in a tightly corked bottle and in the ice box; and the housewife always feels a little more comfortable if she has some on hand, for then she knows that a salad may be gotten up very quickly in case of unexpected company.

Speaking of unexpected company—it is a good idea to also have on hand some cans of soup, for just such an emergency—and then when one has company to lunch all that has to be done is to warm the soup, have a lettuce salad for a second course, with bread and butter, and for a sweet course after this have some fried bread with hot maple syrup. For this cut the slices of bread and dip them into beaten egg to which a little milk has been added, and fry in butter. Serve hot, on hot plates, with hot maple syrup, or, if you haven't the syrup, serve strawberry or plum preserve.

If you happen to know you are going to have company for lunch, make some rolled bread sandwiches. To do this, immediately after breakfast wrap freshly baked bread in a cloth wrung out of cold water, then cover with a dry cloth. Let it stand three hours if possible. Then cut into the thinnest possible slices, butter each, remove crusts and roll. Usually they will stay rolled, but if there seems to be a tendency to unroll, have a ball of soft white string and as each is rolled tie it loosely around with the string—to be removed, of course, just before being brought to the table.

Now for a new recipe for an ice, which is called Cup St. Jacques, and which is served at The Touraine, in Boston, for fifty cents an order. This sounds as though it might be an extravagant concoction, but it is not any more so than any other ice. Depends on whether you make it or order it at The Touraine.

CUP ST. JACQUES.

Make a syrup by boiling four cups water and two cups sugar twenty minutes; add three-fourths cup lemon juice; cool, strain and freeze. Serve in champagne glasses, filling the glass only to the top; then pour over the ice a teaspoonful maraschino and pile up on the ice fresh fruit and candied cherries. The fruit is usually cut bananas and about three Malaga grapes; this may be varied according to the time of year, and fresh strawberries or pineapple would be equally delicious. As the ice is perfectly white this dish lends itself prettily to arrangement of color, and if strawberries were used one would not care to use the candied cherries, but simply the white or green grapes with the berries and ice; in case of the banana or pineapple, however, the cherries give the needed touch of bright color.

Our illustration shows the way this ice is served at The Touraine, but if one has the glass cups with handles, usually used for serving punch, and has not the champagne glasses, they may be decorated in the same way and look almost as well.

Please bear in mind, when using these recipes, that all measurements are level, as we have stated several times in the past.

Dollars for Pennies.

"THE LIGHT THAT WON'T GO OUT."

Every family in America is ready to buy "The light that sells on sight"—the wonderful new invention called ARC-LIGHT WICK.

It burns a whole year without trimming. It kills a candle, discounts kerosene, beats gas, and almost equals electricity or sunlight.

It saves 20 per cent. of oil. It's clear, white and brilliant. It's the light that won't go out. It's the light in the window for thee.

The Light That Sells On Sight.

The ARC-LIGHT is something new. All need it, all buy it, all bless it. To show it means to sell it, and it yields from 100 per cent. to 300 per cent. profit to agents.

The same kind of carbon that gives the electric light its brilliancy is woven into the Arc-Light by a patent process. We hold affidavit showing that an Arc-Light burned 1049 hours, giving the last hour the same perfect, brilliant, light it gave the first.

A single lamp manufacturer in New England, who bought over 35,000 writes: "The Arc-Light beats all others. It sells our lamps, and turns night into day." Every home, store, hotel, car company will saloon, hall, church, or buy the Arc-Light Wick on sight. We have made arrangement with the manufacturers to introduce this wonderful discovery, and we offer for 60 days the following wholesale terms to agents:

Medium or A wick, 5-8 inch wide—the size for house lamps—by mail, sample 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $2.50. Small or E wicks, for hand lamps, lanterns, etc., 3-8 inch wide, sample, 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $2.50. Large or B wicks, for table, bracket lamps, 1 inch wide, hall, store, or bracket, or 33 cents dozen; per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, parlor lamps, sample, 33 cents; per gross, $3.50. D wick, 1 1-2 inches wide, for incubators, accompanied store lamps, sample, 8 cents; per dozen, $3.50. A gross wicks for sample dozen, giving width desired, and see how they go. We can supply you with any style ARC-LIGHT WICK in any quantities, from a single wick to a thousand dozen.

It is only necessary for old or young to eat a few of our Pepsin Salted Peanuts after meals to keep in perfect health—but they can also be eaten in any quantity as a confection without the least distress or trouble to the weakest stomach. Children delight to feast on them and they are much better than candy. They also cure Heart Burn and Insomnia.

To Form Part of the Treat or Refreshments at party gatherings, sociables, etc., they are indispensable, and to have them on the table as dessert is the best of form. Everyone, both old and young, now wants a few in the pocket at all times to nibble on—for with all the troublesome oils properly treated as they are in our special process of Curing and Roasting Peanuts, they have at last lost all terrors to weak stomachs, and are warranted not to become rancid, and to keep well in any climate.

FREE We will send two thousand packages of these Pepsin Salted Peanuts out to responsible parties who furnish proper references. You sell 12 ten-cent packages and FREE get a watch, a guaranteed good timekeeper. But to first introduce them quickly we send one package as a sample free to any one enclosing six cents for a three months' subscription to COMFORT. You can then test them and see how many packages you want to start with. No attention paid to first orders without trial 6c subscription. Write at once and be among the first to get the free packages.

Seat-Distribution in Congress.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

It IS rarely the case that a member of the House of Representatives can hold the same seat during two successive terms of Congress, while a Senator may hold the same seat as long as he remains a member of the upper chamber. The method of alloting seats in the Senate is entirely different from that which prevails in the House. At the beginning of Congress, the House of Representatives holds a sort of seat-lottery—that is to say, the members draw for choice of seats. The man who is so fortunate as to get the first choice may select any seat he prefers on his side of the House; the man who gets the second choice may select any seat left after the first man has chosen, and so on till the whole house is seated—the republicans selecting seats on the republican-side and the democrats selecting seats on the democratic-side of the chamber. It sometimes happens, however, that "the father of the House" (that is, the oldest member of the House, measured by the test of continuous service), is allowed to make his selection independently of the seat-lottery. But in the Senate, an entirely different rule prevails. The constitutional distribution of the terms of United States Senators is such that one-third of them reach the end of their current terms every two years, and must either succeed themselves by re-election or give place to new men. So that it is an ancient custom in the Senate to allow any Senator whose term is not to expire at the time to "file-on" any seat which is about to become vacant by reason of the expiration of the term of its present occupant; and the one who first files his claim with the sergeant-at-arms gets the seat when it becomes vacant. The result is that, as soon as a Senator gets fairly settled in his first seat (which is not usually a very desirable one), he begins to look around for the seat of some other Senator whose location is considered desirable over his own and who is not likely to be re-elected. This process of filing on the seat of another Senator consists in filing with the sergeant-at-arms a request for the seat when it becomes vacant; and, if the seat actually becomes vacant, the one who files the first claim gets it; but, if the Senator who occupies it succeeds in getting re-elected, the one who files on his seat gets left and must begin the "looking-around" process again.

This custom has naturally given rise to a great many interesting stories relative to the alertness of Senators in filing claims on the seats of other Senators whose political suns were supposed to be setting. It often happens that fortune so favors a Senator that he gets a very desirable seat early in his senatorial career—Senator Gear, of Iowa, affords an instance of this kind. He occupies the seat once held by Roscoe Conkling, of New York. When Conkling resigned on account of his quarrel with President Garfield, no one had filed on his seat, as no one knew in advance that it was to become vacant; but Conkling requested Cameron, of Pennsylvania, to hold his seat for him for a couple of days—till he could run up to Albany and secure a re-election. He did not secure his re-election, however, and Cameron held the seat permanently. Years afterwards, Cameron met Dawes, of Massachusetts, somewhere west and confided to him the information that he (Cameron) would not be a candidate for re-election; whereupon, Dawes filed on Cameron's seat and got it when Cameron retired from the Senate. This same seat was held by Dubois when he walked out of the St. Louis convention with Senator Teller and others in 1896; so Senator Gear had an idea that Dubois would never be re-elected to the Senate and filed on his seat and got it when Dubois retired. Tradition says that ex-Senator John H. Reagan, of Texas, had the habit, when he was a member of the Senate, of changing around from seat to seat—occupying the seat of any Senator who happened to be temporarily absent on account of illness or business out of the city; and it was also a coincidence that some of these Senators whose seats Reagan had thus occupied managed to die during their terms in the Senate—so that Reagan got to be regarded as a sort of Senatorial "hoodoo." Senator Zeb Vance, of North Carolina, was a sort of wag and never missed an opportunity to perpetrate a joke on any one, no matter who it was. One day, he happened to be detained away from the Chamber by illness, and he wrote a note, begging pathetically, "For God's sake don't let Reagan get my chair"——and his chair was removed bodily from the Chamber to keep Reagan out of it.

When Senator George H. Pendleton, of Ohio, was in the Senate, he occupied a very desirable seat; but, when he succeeded in getting the Civil Service Act passed, Senator Vest, of Missouri, said that no man who would be the author of such a measure as that could ever be re-elected to the Senate of the United States and filed on Pendleton's seat—and got it, for Pendleton was not returned when his term expired. It is not often that two Senators from the same State sit next to each other; but, by swapping seats, the Senators from Arkansas, Missouri, Massachusetts and Iowa occupy adjacent seats.

But, when a Senator changes his seat, he changes only its location, for he retains the same chair and desk. The late Senator Morrill, of Vermont, who far exceeded "Benton's thirty years in the Senate," occupied the same chair and desk throughout his long senatorial career.

Records have been kept of each desk since the end of the Civil War, but there is nothing authentic concerning earlier times; so that the oldest man connected with the Senate knows nothing about the seats of the great men of the past. Hannibal Hamlin was allowed to take his chair with him when he retired from the Senate, but that courtesy has not been extended to any one since that time because of the increased historic interest which attaches to these seats after they have been long in service and been occupied by some of the great men of the country. In this connection a story is told. Some twenty-odd years ago, a lot of furniture which had been worn out by long usage was permanently retired from the cloak-rooms. There was such a tremendous demand for this old furniture among lovers of such relics and there was so much pressure brought to bear by those who sought them—such high prices offered, that, finally, a resolution was passed by which the furniture was turned over to a certain hospital to be raffled-off in a way which would raise considerable money for a public charity. So that, the next day, two ladies who were very anxious for some particular pieces hurried out to the hospital with large sums of money for the purpose of paying almost any price for what they sought; but, to their amazemennt when they got there, they were blandly told by the janitor that he had chopped them all up for kindling the night before.

The STANDARD BOOK on POLITENESS

Good Behavior and Social Etiquette. Your Manners May Be Your Fortune.

At last the door is opened and the riddle solved. This Book gives Practical Advice and knowledge to all that desire to enter Society or Business Perfect and Graceful in their Manners. There is a SOMETHING in this Book that our Artist could not illustrate nor could we find words to express it. Were you ever at a friendly gathering where everything seemed to go wrong--guests all separated by a barrier of reserve--gloom settling down on the scene, when all at once a person enters who seems gifted with a spell, like that of the old Magicians, the gloom disappears, the ice thaws and they all enjoy themselves. This Book tells that great Secret--how to so behave that your society will be courted and sought after by every one. This is the wonderful power of Manners. It is worth to you more than Beauty. True Politeness, as this Book teaches it, will give you access to any family in America, and then you want nothing but opportunity to become great. It is a charm better to possess than talent or wealth. This Book embraces the Usages and Customs of Good Society, Etiquette, Social Intercourse, Dress, Introduction, Cards, Letters and Presents, Conversation, Morning Calls, Dinners, Balls, Evening Parties, Love, Courtship and Marriage, Riding and Driving, the Promenade, Boating, Staying with Friends, etc. It teaches how to act in any emergency, or enter any society without embarrassment, and how to avoid incorrect and vulgar habits, in the Street, at Home, or in Society. It is a Perfect Guide to New Beginners in fashionable life. Parents should purchase this Book, and keep it where their Sons and Daughters can easily refer to it. It is a Text Book of Gentility. It will bring out the finer qualities of a Lady or Gentleman, even if you were born in the backwoods. Price 25 Cents, or Three for 50 cts. by mail.

SPECIAL. Send 50 cents to-day for a two years' subscription to our popular monthly SUNSHINE, and we will send all three, "The Book of Politeness," "Society Dances," and "Letter Writer," free. Address SUNSHINE, Augusta, Maine.

TALKS WITH GIRLS.

CONDUCTED BY COUSIN MARION.

How do you do, dears. I have been away taking a little rest, which came so unexpectedly that I did not have a chance to say good-by to you or to ask you to wish me well until we met again. Now I come back and I find so many letters from you that I am glad I didn't stay any longer. I hope you have enjoyed yourselves as much while I was away as I did.

The first I come to is from Fleet of Normal, Ills. and she wants to know what to do when young men whom she knows make remarks about her loud enough to be heard in passing. You ought to call the police, dear, but you can't, and must ignore the remarks and also the young men who make them.

Adella, Long Prairie, Minn.—Stop loving the man who doesn't love you. You ought to know better. (2) Yes, a girl can receive the attentions of more than one man, but not seriously. (3) It is proper to dance round dances if your parents or church do not object.

Beauty, Colgate, Ind.—Bowen & Merrill, Indianapolis, Ind.

Discouragement, Providence, R. I.—You had better speak to your physician. Quacks and nostrums are of no value. Massage ought to be of value.

Cynthia, Indian Orchard, Mass.—You are young enough not to worry about the persistent young man. He will get over it by and by. (2) Girls of sixteen don't wear trains.

Little Fairy, Waynesburg, Pa.—Don't try to sell your song until a musician has put it in proper shape. Good songs pay well.

Blue Eyes, Harrison, Miss.—Permit no familiarities from the young man, however much you like him. Indeed, that is more reason why you should not. (2) The "rattling" you speak of can only be cured by a course of treatment. Consult a physician. (3) Simply excuse yourself and say nothing. (4) I suppose it would be all right to go ten miles at night with a young man to church in the country. City people, however, would say you should have a chaperone.

Enid, Toledo, Iowa.—A young man should go home by 10.30. (2) Yes, if the other young man does not object. (3) You should always give your "steady company" the preference. (4) It is not right for a lady to accept a fifty cent ring from a young gentleman unless he can't afford a better one.

Skipper, New Columbus, Ky.—If the young man means marriage he should say so, otherwise you should not permit his attentions. You may go out at night with a young man, but kissing is not "nice."

Mac, Thomas, W. Va.—Don't trust too much to what a young man says.

Fifteen, Lakewood, N. J.—It is wrong for a girl of fifteen to "except" the photograph of a young man until she knows how to spell.

Sweet Violet, Bunola, Pa.—A girl should always take the advice of her parents regarding the young men she associates with.

Elaine, Toledo, Iowa.—The young man you have been "going with" for two years is entirely too indifferent. Don't waste any more time on him.

"Constant Reader," Lafontaine, Kans.—Ask your nearest music dealer for the song you want. (2) A woman of twenty-one may marry a widower of thirty-seven, either with or without children, but being a good stepmother is hard work.

Modest, Pensacola, Fla.—If you are engaged to the young man you may kiss him when he goes away. Otherwise not.

Sallie Belle, Tuckersville, Ga.—Use plain unruled white or tinted paper in your correspondence. (2) Runaway marriages sometimes turn out very well, but don't run away if you can help it. (3) Wear as many "friendship hearts" on your bracelet as you can get. (4) Introduce, or present, the man to the woman, always.

Sorena, Welisville, Ohio.—There is a proper form for a letter to a person you have not met. Don't write letters to strangers at all.

Joe, Talbot, Ind.—Eight years is too long to wait for a man to make love and say nothing of marriage. Try some one else.

N. N. D., Peru, Ind.—A girl of seventeen may love a man of twenty-eight, but it is much better for a girl of twenty-one to love a man of thirty-two.

Lily White, Aramore, I. T.—For the millionth time let me tell all the cousins that it is simply horrid to be hugging and kissing. It seems to me you ought to know better.

Queen Elizabeth, Oregon, Mo.—No girl can be in love with two men at the same time. You don't know your own mind, that is all. Wait five years.

City Belle, Shawtown, O.—"Thank you," is a very good reply to make to the greeting: "Happy to meet you."

Puss and Pet, Tempe, Ariz.—I suppose it is all right to keep the cowboys to rope and drive cattle, but young ladies don't do so in the East. (2) You might answer the soldier's letter from the Philippines. (3) Girls should never use slang.

Lilith, Saginaw, Mich.—Charlotte M. Braeme and Bertha M. Clay are not the same.

Pink, Morgan, Ky.—Young men should not stay after church till twelve o'clock. (2) Girls should not call on young men camping unless they are chaperoned. (3) Introduce the young man as "Mr." and not by his initials. It is undignified.

Peach Blossom, MacGraw, Kan.—You had better be very careful about "hair removers." Ask your physician.

N. B. Jasper Penn.—You should talk to your physician. "Institutes" are risky.

Thelma, Davenport, Ia.—Miss Alcott's books are not sold in cheap form, I believe. (2) You may call on a bride though you do not know the groom. Why not? (3) You may call on friends though in mourning. (4) Let your beau go, if he doesn't want to stay.

Lu, Spokane, Wash.—Why send off twelve cents and a lock of your hair to have your fortune told when you can do it just as well yourself? (2) Don't exchange photographs with young men. (3) Presents may be accepted from young men, but only simple ones; candy, flowers, and books.

Ygonde, Atha, O.—Whatever you do don't marry the man who drinks. It isn't necessary to marry a man you do not love. Remain single and the man you love may reform.

A Friend of Girls, Denver, Col.—Writes to object to the "advise" I give these cousins of mine. Possibly if this "Friend" learned to spell, she might write differently.

Florrie M., Wilmington, N. C.—Consult any music publisher about your song. (2) Straight hair will not be kept in curl in damp weather.

Belle Dial, Weston, Iowa.—Yes, you may accept another escort when the first one is not prompt. (2) Evidently the young man is not seriously in love with you.

Distress, Gas City, Ind.—Don't take arsenic for the skin unless you consult your physician.

Julia S., Zionsville, Ind.—There is always danger in trying to remove superfluous hair. Ask a druggist or a barber.

Cherry, Marion, Iowa:—Your letter was sent to the Navy Department at Washington to be forwarded.

Violet, Strongsville, Ohio.—Engagement rings are always customary and you should have one. (2) A rosebud means budding love.

Rosy, Louisville, Ky.—Organize your society without a charter. It will be time enough to get a charter when you extend it to other towns and chapters.

Carry M., Wilcox, Mo.—It is the lady's place to speak first. (2) When the "mitten" has been given to a man nothing more is to be done than get another man to take his place.

Rose, Hudsonville, Mich.—Cancelled stamps are bought by stamp dealers generally. See advertisements in COMFORT. (2) Yes, the young man's parents should make an effort to know what kind of a woman he is to marry.

Maggie K., Chicago, Ills.—The government does not offer a premium for seventh sons. Where did you ever get that idea?

Now, dears, some of you are answered and some are not, but you will be by and by. Here's wishing you a very Merry Christmas.

Searching for Sufferers

YOU MAY NOT FEEL SICK

BUT ALL HANDS POINT TO THE FACT YOU ARE NOT WELL AND WHETHER YOU BE MAN OR WOMAN YOU WILL SOON TAKE ON THIS AGONIZED LOOK.

WE CAN HELP YOU.

YOU DON'T NEED MEDICINE.

But you say you feel generally miserable or suffer with a thousand and one indescribable bad feelings, both mental and physical? Among them low spirits, nervousness, weariness, lifelessness, weakness, dizziness, feelings of fullness or bloating after eating, or sense of "goneness" or emptiness of stomach in morning, flesh soft and lacking firmness, headache, blurring of eyesight, specks floating before the eyes, nervous irritability, poor memory, chilliness, alternating with hot flushes, lassitude, throbbing, gurgling, or rumbling sensations in bowels, with heat and nipping pains occasionally, palpitation of heart, short breath on exertion, slow circulation of blood. Don't your hands and feet become cold and clammy, do you HAWK AND SPIT and expectorate greenish colored matter? IS your urine scanty or high colored and does it deposit a sediment after standing? You have pain and oppression in chest and back, pain around the loins, aching and weariness of the lower limbs, drowsiness after meals, but nervous wakefulness at night, languor in the morning and a constant feeling of dread as if something awful was about to happen.

There Is Help for You. You Can Yet Be Happy

I have an appliance. The only way to introduce it is to let you try it FREE. You will tell others if it helps you. It is perfectly harmless. Send us your name we are looking for real sufferers and knowing it will do you good you can cure yourself without trouble or expense. This article is perfectly safe and reliable, can be worn day and night, all of the time or part of the time and in any place or spot on the body that feels sick or shows pain—it is most marvelous acting and is the greatest God-send you ever heard of. After you use it and you feel its power you will say $25 would not have prevented me from sending for it. It acts just as well on man as woman.

THE ONLY CONDITIONS.

We send one all charges paid. It's Medical and we are obliged to put on Revenue stamps. Therefore as we furnish them entirely free we simply ask you to send us TEN CENTS for mailing, etc. We trust to your honor to tell others about the cure and know many will be sold thereby. We do not ask you to send any more money unless you want others to sell at a profit after you try it. Address,

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

JANUARY begins with a New Moon and ends with a New Moon. A figure erected for the time of the conjunction at 44 minutes past 8 o'clock in the morning on New Year's Day shows the first decanate of the sign Aquarius rising, with Venus just ascending and the last decanate of Scorpio culminating. The ruler of the scheme is located in the tenth house in the sign Sagittarius in which is also found the great benefic Jupiter. The Lunation falls in the 12th house within 4 degrees of Mars; Saturn is in the 11th house near the cusp of which Mercury stands in the Moon's Node. The indications of the figure are in the main good and indicate a high degree of prosperity and success for our Nation and our people in the mass. There are some discordant elements, it is true, prominent among which are the treacherous actions of some secret enemies of the administration who not only do not work for or promote the public welfare but seek the injury of the Nation by treacherous methods. The great benefic Jupiter so near the South meridian and the lesser benefic Venus just rising, thus benevolently occupying the two most powerful angles of the figure, indicates that for the month the nation continues its steady progress and is prosperous and successful despite the mischievous efforts for harm. Congress will work harmoniously for the public good notwithstanding Saturn in the 11th shows some treacherous action of malcontents.

A disagreeable feature of the figure is the presence of the inflammatory Mars near the conjoined luminaries, pointing to some violence to prisoners or the outbreak of some epidemic or eruptive disease among soldiers in southeastern regions. Disorderly elements in prison or places of detention in those regions may succeed in escaping from the authorities or in working violent harm to keepers or guards. The month will probably give more than usual contention and fires are likely to be very destructive. Troubles of minor character near the Mexican border are threatened. There will be increased mortality from eruptive diseases, or such as affect the digestive organs and the kidneys and head; and persons subject to apoplectic troubles should exercise unusual care throughout January. The same conditions emphasize the injunction for all to be temperate in habit and to abstain from the use of intoxicating drinks, especially those with apoplectic tendencies.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR JANUARY, 1900.

JANUARY 1—Monday. Form no hasty conclusions in business during this day; litigation and contention are likely to interfere seriously with the happy outcome of affairs of magnitude or importance now begun; be not rash in thought or act and scrutinize carefully all business enterprises now presenting themselves; seek no promotion in public positions, be patient with thine associates and do not offend thine employer. Conditions are very threatening and caution more than ordinary prudence in all business ventures; combustion is quickened and some bad fires, explosions and violent disasters are very probable in these passing days and much increased mortality from kidney and digestive troubles, apoplexy and from hemorrhages and violence will be noticed. All persons born about the 4th of April, July, October and January of past years, will need to exercise more than ordinary care in finances and should be very prudent in diet, avoid heat, inflammation and excitement and look out for eruptive troubles and fires; those of the gentle sex so born should council their male relations to be specially guarded as to health and pecuniary transactions and they themselves should not permit serious difficulties or quarrels to interfere with their best welfare in life. Being a holiday, to some extent, and likely to be much given to social communion and entertainment, there is danger under the heightened inflammatory influences of the day, this year, that extraordinary harm and physical disorders will result to very many who give way to any intemperate impulses. Stimulants will be peculiarly mischievous in arousing strife, contention and violence. REGULUS advises prudence, patience, and great moderation in all the affairs of life.

2—Tuesday. This is a superior day and specially fortunate for every honorable pursuits; buy goods for trade, speculate in legitimate methods of business, travel and apply for favor or money accommodations; waste no moments in idleness.

3—Wednesday. Continue thine efforts of yesterday with the utmost vigor; giving preference, if any, to business pertaining to the elegant and decorative in life; consult thy dressmaker, tailor, jeweler and artist and do all things that require the exercise of taste; patented articles of an artistic or decorative character are likely to prove profitable if they offer themselves at this time; the afternoon is less to be depended upon, except for literary work and mental labor.

4—Thursday. Be stirring early and employ every moment of the day until three in the afternoon. Use the forenoon for the pursuit of all general business, but particularly for dealings with printers, publishers, stationers and real estate traders, also for the purchase and sale of such commodities as coal, iron, petroleum, wood, lumber, lead, wool and grain; also for engagements for the improvement of lands; but as the afternoon advances put on the breaks, avoiding all haste and pull the purse strings securely to prevent needless extravagance and loss.

5—Friday. Give a wide berth to all public officers with whom thou shouldst not seek to conduct important business; large corporations will not favor thee in the forenoon; the afternoon and evening, however, are superior for dealings with dentists, chemists, surgeons, builders, masons and all mechanics and workers in brass, iron and glass.

6—Saturday. The week ends with an especially unfavorable day until the evening and more than ordinary circumspection should be exercised in all thine undertakings of much magnitude; indeed a little procrastination at this time will be likely to prove rather more salutary than otherwise. Do not have any important transaction with the pen, for the time is very evil for all kinds of contracts especially pertaining to houses and lands or mining properties. Those of the intellectual and literary classes born about the 19th of March, 21st of June, 22nd of September, or 20th of December of past years, are now in the midst of adverse conditions and have unusual troubles in their affairs or are suffering more than usual nervous or mental troubles or anxieties from their written contracts or their correspondence, or from slanderous tongues and fraudulent representations; the evening of this day is by far the best and should be given preference as much as possible for all the important engagements.

7—Sunday. A very favorable Sabbath day, especially for church matters; the evening is particularly propitious for social conversations and the contemplation of the beautiful in literature and art.

8—Monday. Be in no haste to begin the day's labors; be slow to anger; keep out of controversy and be prudent under all kinds of excitement in the morning hours. As the day advances, however, bend all thine energies to business; push thy bargains in houses, lands, mines and all agricultural and mining products; make contracts and urge literary matters and correspondence to the utmost; printers, publishers, press-writers, mathematicians, scientists and all employed with the pen should use the latter part of the day for their most vigorous efforts.

9—Tuesday. An excellent day for the fine arts and for all kinds of business concerned with articles of adornment and dress; the late hours are less to be depended upon.

10—Wednesday. The very early hours forbid advantage from any venture pertaining to the elegant in life, when no dress goods should be selected or any artistic wares purchased; but after nine in the forenoon conditions favor the greatest activity in all business pursuits; especially such as are concerned with hardware, machinery, tools, chemicals, or with the mechanical and manufacturing interests; deal in cattle, metals, drugs, fire-arms and glass-ware, and with persons who are engaged in such callings.

11—Thursday. An evil day in which, particularly, matters of much importance are best deferred; quarrels, bad accidents and strife are easy of occurrence under these influences and more than usual prudence and moderation is urged; money losses come unless great care is had; beware of having any surgical operation performed on this day, if it can possibly be avoided.

12—Friday. Let all engaged in the elegant occupations and polite arts improve the whole of this day; artists and musicians are particularly favored in the afternoon when dexterity in execution will be marked; the evening gives pleasure from the drama or musical entertainment.

13—Saturday. The conditions do not promise success in new and important enterprises now begun, and caution care in all things; do not let disappointment depress thee nor be stubborn or rebellious to thine own injury.

14—Sunday. A day of intellectual acuteness though tendencies to sarcasm and bitterness of speech are incited; strange whims and notions become pronounced and the temper will need healthful check.

15—Monday. Give no offence to thy superior or employer nor seek advantage from persons in authority; the day is peculiarly unpromising and forbids profit or advantage from anything now begun. Persons born about the 14th of April 17th of July, 18th of October, or 15th of January, of past years, are likely to be now in the midst of contention or strife and should be careful not to precipitate trouble of considerable magnitude by their own rashness or pugnacity; children so born should have the best of care as these days are passing, especially if there is any prevalence of eruptive diseases, for measles scarlet-fever, diphtheria, etc., are likely to be more than usually dangerous. Married ladies so born are cautioned against permitting domestic inharmonies to make serious ruptures in the marital relations. The male relatives of such ladies are the cause of mental troubles and anxieties; let all be temperate in habit and in diet, considerate of the rights of others, and cautious not to become involved in disputes; be watchful against fires and explosions and see that no harm comes from horses, dogs, or machinery.

16—Tuesday. The very early hours are not promising, being rather promotive of contention; be not oversensitive to reproach or rash in word or act, but as the day is ell entered upon let every moment be improved for forwarding all important matters, especially such as concern the fine arts and all money transactions; purchase artistic wares, wearing apparel, dry and fancy goods and all those things which furnish pleasure and gratification to mankind.

17—Wednesday. Have no real estate transaction in the morning when matters are hindered much; the day is better as it advances and all things should be urged vigorously.

18—Thursday. Do not wed on this day nor expect success in the elegant pursuits or in dealings in fancy or ornamental goods. The day is dangerous to the purse, in that impulses come to make purchases that are wholly unnecessary or beyond the means, or that will not give permanent satisfaction; beware of speculation; the forenoon encourages transactions with real estate men and in such commodities as coal, wood, lumber, grain, and other agricultural products.

19—Friday. The morning promises but little if any favor from dealings with officers of large corporations and contributes disquiet in the domestic circle; the afternoon and evening, however, conduce to success in all literary undertakings; push correspondence and apply the mind vigorously towards forwarding all thine affairs.

20—Saturday. The forenoon is indifferent in promises but as the noon is past let all energies be put forth; deal with surgeons, druggists, chemists, cutlers, machinists and all workers with fire and metals; the midnight hours are evil and mental depression frequently attended with disagreeable dreams will be noted.

21—Sunday. The best Sabbath day in the month; the efforts of the clergy will be especially happy and effective and minds will dwell with earnestness and zeal on the contemplation of religious subjects; church matters are prosperous.

22—Monday. Begin this day early but give preference to transactions concerning the elegant things in life; the pursuits of the fine arts is encouraged until three in the afternoon; after which conditions conspire to embarrass such matters and literary engagements do not result satisfactorily; postpone correspondence, especially such as concerns money and the affairs of the wealthy; see that no mistakes are made in figures or accounts in the afternoon hours.

23—Tuesday. The forenoon should be used for hiring or purchasing houses or lands and dealing with miners, tinners, plumbers, brick and stone masons and all engaged in the laborious or dirty avocations; put on the cautious cap in the afternoon when quarrels and disputes are easily provoked; seek no favor from thine employer nor have any surgical operation performed during the day; the evening promises pleasure from dramatic or musical entertainment or the social gathering.

24—Wednesday. Apply to persons in authority for favor or advantage during the middle hours of this day; be careful here that thine inclination to disburse money is prompted by thine actual needs and not a mere whim or fancy, as the passing days give tendency towards extravagance or wastefulness of this world's goods to obtain mere gratifications.

25—Thursday. Begin this day with the Sun and improve every moment; the merchant, tradesman, commercial traveler, and all engaged in literary pursuits or having employment concerning books or newspapers are particularly favored; authors will find their efforts on this day bringing forth good fruit; buy goods for trade, travel, and urge all honorable undertakings; execute contracts and do important correspondence.

26—Friday. Seize the early forenoon hours for pressing all engagements, especially if such concern thy money matters or depend for success upon the favor of thy superior in business; do not look for success in the fine arts nor expect any advantage from thy dealings with officers of state or of great corporations.

27—Saturday. Keep out of disputes on this day; do not institute legal proceedings nor expect any favor from thine employer.

28—Sunday. The morning hours are all mischievous and prompt rest and quiet and tardy rising, but as the forenoon opens conditions change for the better and pulpit utterances are likely to be noted for readiness of eloquent utterance; the evening is peculiarly propitious for enjoyment of all things beautiful and artistic and for quickening the tender sentiments.

29—Monday. Look out on this day that no loss comes from any speculative deal and do not let haste of decision or impatience of suggestion or control lead thee to action detrimental to thy best interests; keep a check upon all impulses.

30—Tuesday. Urge all matters of an honorable nature during the first two-thirds of this day, due regard being had for a too hasty inclination in the afternoon, when all strife is to be guarded against especially if born about the 29th of January, April, July, or October of past years. All these latter persons are easily drawn into controversy at this time unless they are carefully on their guard. Such persons who are subject to disturbances in the circulation of the blood should avoid excitement in these days and do nothing to aggravate any heart disorder they may have seen symptoms of in that line.

31—Wednesday. The month ends with a fairly favorable day, conducive to a good degree of success in all honorable undertakings.

FREE HELP FOR WEAK MEN
"CALTHOS"
Prof. Laborde's Marvelous French Cure for Lost Manhood.
FIVE DAYS' TRIAL TREATMENT
Sent Absolutely Free by Sealed Mail To All Sufferers.
NO C. O. D. OR DEPOSIT SCHEME.

The only preparation known to science which really cures Lost Manhood is "CALTHOS," the marvelous French remedy discovered by Prof. Jules Laborde. It is controlled in this country by The Von Mohl Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, a concern which occupies a high and honorable place in the world of medicine. It is one of the largest and most responsible houses in Cincinnati, as anyone who is acquainted in that city will testify.

The Von Mohl Company invites all men suffering from Lost Manhood, Spermatorrhœa, Varicocele, Small Parts or Weakness of any nature in the Nerves or Sexual Organs, to send their names and receive a five days' treatment. This will prove the wonderful vitalizing powers of "CALTHOS." After using it five days the sufferers will find new vigor in their organs, new force in their muscles, new blood in their veins, new ambition, and rapid progress toward the buoyant feelings and sensations of younger days.

This liberal free offer is genuine. There is no swindling C. O. D. or Deposit Scheme connected with it. The five days' treatment is sent by sealed mail to all on request, wrapped in a plain package, and full printed instructions accompany the medicine, so that each patient becomes his own doctor and cures himself at home.

It doesn't make any difference what caused the weakness—whether bad habits in youth, or excess, or overwork, or business troubles. "CALTHOS" will effect a cure, no matter what big name the disease may be called by doctors.

The Von Mohl Company treats all correspondence in perfect confidence. Under no conditions will it make public the names of the thousands who have written testimonials telling of their restoration to robust manhood after other medicines and appliances have proved worthless. "CALTHOS" is regularly used in the French and German armies, and the soldiers in those countries have come to be perfect models of strength and vitality. Cures are effected at all ages from twenty to eighty years. There is no case (except where the stage of epilepsy or insanity has been reached) which it will not radically, quickly and permanently cure. Sexual weakness does not cure itself. It grows worse from week to week. Each day aggravates the mental and physical anguish.

Send today for the free five days' trial treatment. If it helps you, more of the medicine can be purchased. If it does not help, no harm is done and no money has been paid out. You can send your name in the full knowledge that it will be kept from all. The "CALTHOS" department of our business is strictly confidential. Address applications for trial treatment, etc., to

GREATEST MONEY MAKER AND MONEY SAVER EVER SEEN: NEEDED IN EVERY HOUSE IN THE WORLD.

Hundreds of dollars are wasted every year in paying for repairs which could be done by you just as well as by the person you hire. "Yes," you will say, "I could do this work if I only had the tools." You have to hire the plumber or cobbler and pay him for his time while you stand around and look on, watching him do the work which you could do as well as he, but it is always that you have no tools. We have put together the best kit of tools for repairing which was ever seen, and we will sell the entire outfit for less than half the money for which you could buy it at any store. The outfit consists of forty-four first-class tools, as shown in the above cut, viz: 1 iron last for men's work; 1 iron last for boy's work; 1 iron last for women's work; 1 iron last for children's work; 1 iron stand for lasts; 1 shoehammer; 1 shoeknife; 1 peg awl handle; 1 peg awl; 1 wrench for peg awl handle; 1 sewing awl handle; 1 sewing awl; 1 stabbing awl handle; 1 stabbing awl; 1 bottle leather cement; 1 bottle rubber cement; 1 bunch bristles; 1 ball shoe thread; 1 ball shoe wax; 1 pkg. clinch nails, 4-8 in.; 1 pkg clinch nails 5-8 in.; 1 pkg. clinch nails, 6-8 in.; 1 pkg. heel nails; 4 prs. heel plates, assorted sizes; 6 harness needles; 1 harness and saw clamp; 1 box slotted rivets, assorted sizes; 1 rivet set for same; 1 harness and belt punch; 1 soldering iron, ready for use; 1 handle for same; 1 bar solder; 1 bar resin; 1 bottle soldering fluid; 1 copy directions for halfsoling, etc., 1 copy directions for soldering all securely packed, together with directions for use, in a neat case. These tools bought at a hardware store separately would cost between $7.00 and $9.00. You can repair boots and shoes, tap and heel them, mend your harness or make a new one, mend all kinds of tinware, repair pumps, plumbing and similar work, and do all kinds of leather work about carriages, etc., as well as repair and mend rubber boots, rubbers, overshoes, and all kinds of rubber made articles. The clamp is used for mending harnesses and filing saws. Has a coil spring and is made of iron. You can easily save five times the cost of this outfit in six months and make a heap of money doing little repairs for your neighbors and others. "A stitch in time saves nine," and if you have these tools in your house you can make repairs and save a great deal of money which you would pay if you let a break go or hired a man to do your repairing work for you. Every one of these tools are full sized, practical, neat and cheap. It is the only complete outfit in the market and thousands have been sold in past years for $3.00 when the outfit contained but about half as many smaller articles to people living in the country and small towns as well as in the city. This repairing outfit, weighing 20 lbs. will be sent by freight complete as above described for only $1.62 which includes a 6 months trial subscription to this paper.

GREAT PREMIUM OFFER.—If you will get up a club of 6 yearly trial subscribers to this paper at the special price of 26 cents each, we will send you one of these repairing outfits as a present to you.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE war in the Transvaal has become so important that it now occupies the largest part of the columns of the daily newspapers, which are full of telegraphic accounts of the fighting between the troops of Great Britain and the armies of the Dutch republic. Although there has been very much printed about these questions, they have not occupied the attention of American readers very much until recently, and a great many people even now have but vague ideas of the situation or what the trouble is about.

The South African republic, commonly known as the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, are two Dutch republics in the interior of the south part of Africa, neither of them having any sea coast or water communication excepting the rivers which flow from the interior into the South Indian Ocean, and cross foreign territory after leaving the Transvaal before entering the ocean.

The Orange Free State is a little country of about the same size territory as occupied by our state of Kentucky, nestling along the western part of the southern boundary of the South African republic. The Transvaal is about three times as large in territory, being approximately the same size as New Mexico. It is cut off from the ocean on its upper eastern border by the Portuguese colony of East Africa, which is as big as Texas and Louisana combined, and below that by Tonga Land, a little country about equal to New Hampshire in size, then by Zulu Land, which is a British protectorate about as large as Maryland.

The Orange Free State is cut off from the ocean on the south by Basuto Land and the great extent of country known as Cape of Good Hope, the southern part of which is the region called Cape Colony, and is entirely British. The whole of the Cape of Good Hope is a little larger than Texas; and Basuto Land, which is in the middle of the south-east border of the Orange Free State, is about as large as Vermont.

Along the north-west border of the Orange Free State lies Griqua Land west, which is part of the extensive country generally known as Bechuana Land. This is all a British colony and borders the whole of the South African republic on the west and north, and is generally known and is on the maps as British South Africa.

PRESIDENT KRUGER.

The Dutch settlements in South Africa have existed nearly 250 years, the first being at Cape of Good Hope where the Hollanders located in 1652. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV., there was an exodus of the Huguenots from France, and a large body of them sailed to the Cape of Good Hope and founded a colony there. They did not get on well with the Dutch, and in 1709 the use of the French language was forbidden, which was followed in 1724 by a decree closing French missions and churches and forbidding their religious exercises. This caused an exodus of Huguenots to a large extent, those remaining being absorbed and assimilated by the Dutch. This will account for the many French names which our readers will notice in the accounts of this war among the Boer commanders. In this connection it is well to notice that General Joubert, who is in command of the Boers, is of Huguenot extraction, and that DeBeer and OuTroitspan, upon whose farms the diamonds were originally found, were also from the Huguenot families.

The influx of foreigners, especially of British, caused great uneasiness in Cape Colony the beginning of this century. The Dutch settled there were entirely of the agricultural class and disliked any changes. They lived in a simple, primitive way and preserved all the characteristics of the Hollanders of two centuries ago. They were strongly opposed to innovations of any kind and disliked changes of their methods. This brought them into constant friction with the new settlers at the Cape, and in 1833 the relations had become so strained that there was a general exodus of the Boers from Cape Colony across the Vaal River, hence the name Transvaal first came into use. The exodus was accomplished by treking, each farmer taking his household goods and family in large tilt wagons, and driving them with long strings of oxen, their cattle and stock following. They went into this wild new country to establish a government of their own kind. Their contact with the fierce wild men of South Africa, with all kinds of game including lions and elephants, and their agricultural mode of life kept them in the saddle all day, so that they became the most expert horsemen and marksmen in the world. For a few years there was a constant war with the Zulus, but the Trekers or Boers finally drove them out of the country. About ten years from this time, the British occupied Natal, and induced the Boers remaining there to emigrate, which they did in two great streams, one headed toward the Orange Free State and the other toward the Transvaal. Quarrels between their leaders prevented the establishment of any settled form of government, and Great Britain taking advantage of this dispersed the Boer government in Natalia. The annexation in 1848 of Boer land between the Vaal and Orange Rivers by Great Britain caused a rebellion of the Dutch, but they were quickly driven across the Vaal River. There was a desultory war for four or five years, when a convention was signed at the request of Pretorius, the Boer leader, which established the Boer independence in the Transvaal, and the following year his son was proclaimed the first president of the Dutch-African republic and a partial occupation of the Orange Free State. In the year 1867 both diamonds and gold were discovered in the interior, and immediately after Pretorius issued a proclamation enlarging the boundaries of the republic so as to take in Delagoa Bay on the north. This was the beginning of a series of disputes between the republic and Portugal and Great Britain. It was not until 1875 that Delagoa Bay and the coast was given to Portugal under French arbitration. In the mean time there were constant insurrections and armed resistances until 1877, when Great Britain annexed the country.

At this point "Oom Paul" Kruger (Uncle Paul Kruger) and Gen. Joubert first appear on the scene as ambassadors sent to England to protest. The Boers were unanimously against annexation, but were in no condition to resist on account of financial depression; while the excuse of Great Britain at that time was that it was necessary to hold the Transvaal on account of the decision relative to Delagoa Bay, and the Transvaal must be held for the protection of the other British colonies.

COMMANDANT JOUBERT.

For the following three years matters grew worse and worse, and in 1880 the Boer war for independence broke out. The British lost every important engagement there, and their misfortunes culminated at Majuba Mountain where they were disastrously defeated by the superior bravery and generalship of the Boers. A treaty of peace was signed in 1881, by which the Republic was placed under the suzerainty of Queen Victoria, and two years after Oom Paul was elected president under the new conditions.

Things went quietly until 1886, when great discoveries of gold were made in the Transvaal, more particularly in the middle province. English, Americans, and other foreigners flocked there in tens of thousands and engaged in mining everywhere. This enormous influx of people soon placed the relative proportion of about three to one. The new comers, known as Uitlanders, were the possessors of the great wealth of the country as well as a great majority, and rapidly developed it in modern lines, at the same time being unable to vote although heavily taxed and having no share in the government.

A great deal has been written about the ethical side of the case, but it is against all ideas of modern justice that the intelligent and wealthy of a population should be taxed and have no share in the government; and this situation was made doubly strong from the fact that the Boers have resisted progress and advancement in every way, desiring only their primitive life and looking on all changes as innovations that were breaking up their homes. The situation became more strained every day, and finally a raid, which will be remembered, was planned by Dr. Jamieson with some 300 followers with an intention of making an uprising of the Uitlanders in the Transvaal. He was captured at Krugersdorp and afterwards taken to London and tried; he was convicted but only nominally sentenced. Since then there has been a very great deal of diplomatic correspondence between the two countries, Great Britain demanding for the Uitlanders franchise and certain privileges, which were opposed by the Dutch who look on the foreigners as having no real standing in the country. It finally culminated in a declaration of war by President Kruger October 11th of this year.

It is not the intention of COMFORT to give a detailed account of the present war which is daily recounted by the newspaper press; but in this article the purpose is to point out a few of the salient features and so explain them that our readers may read the current news with better intelligence and so more accurately understand the statements that are made.

From what has been written above it can be seen that in one sense the whole war is one for gold; and yet the course of Great Britain is by no means simply a contest for loot, but she is fighting a great battle for civil rights while the Boers are struggling for Dutch supremacy. But, still, there never would have been any war if gold had not been discovered in the Witwatersrand about fifteen years ago.

The Transvaal then was nothing but a rolling land of meadow and mountain, good only for farming and ranching. The Dutch settlers had won it, and as it seemed scarcely worth fighting for, the English let them keep it. It was so little in communication that it took a journey of 40 days by ox cart to reach its boundaries from Cape Town. In 1884 a man named Arnold told a farmer named Geldenhuis that there was gold on his farm. The Dutchman did not believe it, but repeated the story and finally sold the farm to two brothers named Struben, who put up a mill and began to work the grayish earth that has since proven the richest gold ore the earth has ever shown. The Boer Government declared nine farms public gold fields.

Then the rush began. The Boers failed to act quickly and the claims were largely taken up by foreigners. The value of these farms at the time was less than $50,000 while now it is estimated their value is not less than $1,500,000,000. Nearly the entire diggings are in English hands. Everywhere are found rich deposits and the dividends have been enormous in their aggregate.

The diamond industry at Kimberley is managed by an American named Williams. The consolidation of companies effected by Cecil Rhodes represents $900,000,000 in capital. It is curious in this connection to relate the experience of Williams in the Transvaal. When gold was first discovered there were grave doubts about its value. The Rothschilds determined to send an American expert to examine. Williams was a famous gold authority and was selected. He went to the Transvaal and visited the beautiful grazing lands where gold was reported. It was all different from American gold lands. He entered a few shafts of the "reefs" of that marvelous deposit, unlike any other in the world, and examined the queer, black, powdery soil and was thoroughly disgusted.

GEN. W. PENN SYMONS.

In the whole history of the world gold had never been found in such conditions, and he reported the whole story as a fraud and fake; even going so far as to say the whole business was not worth the trouble of alighting from one's horse for examination. So turning his back on this individual plain that now turns out $40,000,000 in gold annually he went to Kimberley and made his strike in another direction.

Our initial cut at the head of this article shows a new engine of war which appeared for the first time in this conflict, and about which frequent allusions have appeared in papers—the armored train. Gen. Kitchener first used them in a crude form on his expedition up the Nile, while we made use of them in the Cuban campaign. These improved cars are lined or cased in steel or iron, being about the build and size of a long coal car. From four points protrude the muzzles of light rapid-fire cannon, and on every side are perforated holes through which to fire rifles. There is also a row close to the front for low volleys. The engine is protected with plates and sandbags and the train has proven a very effective fighting arm, especially for quick relief on railroad lines.

GEN. SIR REDVERS BULLER.

Among the earlier losses Great Britain met with was that of Gen. William Penn Symons, the British commander at Glencoe, shot in the stomach at Dundee. He was a brave man who had served Great Britain in many parts of the world with signal success. His death is particularly notable as being that of the first general officer Britain has had killed or mortally wounded in action for many years.

While some people hope that the war will soon close, there seems to be little prospect of it. The Boers are strong, sturdy fighters, persevering and dogged. They are familiar with firearms and are in their own country, which presents every known obstacle to a quick campaign. The British have unlimited supplies and men and the expedition under the general command of Sir Redvers Buller will have nearly 100,000 armed men under his orders. They will undoubtedly outnumber the Boers two to one, but the latter is fighting defensively and is at advantage. The English must depend on three lines of railroads and have to move long distances, so that an early end of the struggle either by conquest or desire for peace seems improbable. The fighting so far has been about equal in favorable results. Both sides are acting on well-considered plans which show rare combinations of science and military genius. It hardly seems possible that a successful resistance can long be maintained by a small republic against the wealth and strength of England; but there is no doubt that the Dutch will be able to hold their enemies at bay for a long period, no matter what may be the final outcome.

As was above stated, it is not the intention of this article to give a history of the war itself, but the earlier contests have been rather favorable to the Boers who on both sides of the Transvaal have steadily pushed the British back. The campaign has at times showed great disasters to both sides and dogged perseverance in the troops of both armies. It appears the British War Office was not prepared for so aggressive a campaign on the part of the Boers. People who have an exaggerated idea of the horrors of the Spanish War and campaign in Cuba, can realize how little those battles meant as compared with the terrible warfare now going on in South Africa when it is told that the losses to the British army in the first twenty days of the war aggregated more than the entire losses of the American army and navy combined during the entire Spanish War, while the casualties of the Boers are supposed to have been equal if not larger; and yet, bloody as these battles are, they do not compare in proportion killed and wounded to many of the battles of the American Civil War, which have never been equaled in fierceness and disaster by any battle in history.

LET any man follow railroading as long as Tom Walters has and he, too, will have strange experiences to tell about. Tom is a truthful fellow and I am going to tell this story just as he told it to me. He was a messenger in the employ of the Wells & Fargo Express Company, and had been running out of San Francisco for a number of years when he received a note one morning, requesting him to call on the Superintendent at his office. Wondering what was wanted, he went to the office and was promptly admitted to the presence of his superior.

"Ah, Walters!" exclaimed the Superintendent, spinning his chair around and omitting the formality of a salutation, "you are just the man I was expecting. I wanted to see you to tell you that I have decided to transfer you to the A. & P. There is something radically wrong down there, just what and where I am unable to say; but for the past month packages of money have been disappearing from the cars from right under the messengers' noses, if they tell the truth, and we have not been able to trace the thefts to any one. It's all very mysterious and I have concluded to end it by making a clean sweep of the men there, putting in men of known integrity and nerve. You must start to-day and I wish I could tell you just what in particular to guard against, but I cannot; so all I will say is, permit no one to enter your car and remember that 'eternal vigilance is the price of success'."

An order issued by Wells & Fargo's officials is as unalterable as were the laws of the Medes and Persians, therefore Tom's preference as to going or staying where he was would have cut no figure whatever, so he did not express it. Having obtained all the information the Superintendent could give him he said good-by and started that night for The Needles, the western end of his new run.

From The Needles the A. & P. railroad stretches eastward eight hundred miles across Arizona to Albuquerque in New Mexico, traversing a barren region that is criss-crossed by mountain ranges, canyons and lava beds; uninhabited now for the greater part, but once the home of that mysterious, vanished people, the cave dwellers. Just the country one would expect to find filled with train robbers and outlaws of every other description.

Tom arrived at The Needles in due time and at once took out a run. It had never been demonstrated that he had a nervous system but when he reached Albuquerque he was, to draw it mildly, a little shaky. Determined that nothing should be stolen from him he had remained awake throughout the twenty-four hours consumed by the run, and that in connection with the strain entailed by watching for something, he knew not what, had told on his nerves. However, his freight and money checked out right and a night's sound sleep steadied him again. His return trip to The Needles was without incident and nothing going wrong during his next run to Albuquerque and return, he began to think that the loss of the packages was to be attributed to dishonesty on the part of some of the discharged men. So what was his astonishment upon arriving at Albuquerque on his next run, to discover that a package containing a small sum of money was missing.

In no way could he account for the loss. He had slept during a part of the preceding night, as he had full right to do, he remembered, but the doors of his car were locked and barred and he was sure no one had entered. Why did the thief take a package containing so small a sum when there were others with large amounts, he wondered. And why did he take just one when there were several? Cudgel his brain as he would he could evolve no plausible theory. He made the usual report for missing articles and then wrote the Superintendent a letter, detailing most minutely his every action during the trip.

Feeling that the loss of the package reflected upon his watchfulness and zeal, if not his honesty, Tom determined to sleep no more while on the road. He made the return trip to The Needles without accident, but when he again arrived in Albuquerque it was to find that another package had been stolen. He could hardly believe the evidence of his senses. He had remained awake throughout the run, and was positive that no one had entered his car. Bewildered and greatly mortified, he telegraphed the account of this loss to the Superintendent. In a short while he received in reply a telegram that seemed to point to a solution of the mystery. It was brief and read:

"Don't lose your grip. Examine boxes and other freight large enough to hold a man."

Why had not he thought of that before? he asked himself, feeling that he deserved a kicking for his stupidity. Opening his freight book he ran his finger down the list of articles he had handled on the trip and stopped at the entry of a box weighing two hundred pounds which he had taken on at a station called Flagstaff. The box was consigned to the Smithsonian Institute, he noticed, but without a thought as to what that Institute might be. Turning to a list of the run preceding he was scarcely surprised to find that it also contained the entry of a heavy box, shipped from Flagstaff. It was all easy enough to understand now, he thought; he was being systematically victimized by a band of thieves, one of whom would be put in a box and shipped by his confederates; and he, watching his opportunity, would steal out on his thievish errand, then return to his box. It was no new trick and Tom berated himself soundly for not having seen through it sooner.

Promising himself to catch the thief and land him in the penitentiary if he tried the game again, he closed his book; and when he returned to The Needles, he was the most wide awake man on the road. When it came his turn to take again the run to Albuquerque, he felt no anxiety until his train drew up at Flagstaff, and then his eyes were instantly riveted upon a large box that was being brought to his car. He saw at a glance that it bore the Wells & Fargo label, and that it was addressed to the Smithsonian Institute.

"What's in that box?" he asked the man who had it in charge.

"Give it up," the other replied. "There's a queer lot o' fellers claimin' to be professors o' some kind diggin' 'round in the old Indian caves back here in the mountains, and whatever it is they're findin' they've been shippin' back East. They say it's Indian bones and such truck, but I don't swallow that—too many bones back East for 'em to practice on, and fresh ones at that. Goin' by what they said, this box is full o' mummys, dried Indians, you know."

Tom asked nothing farther; he had no doubt as to there being a man in the box, a living man, and he did not want him to suspect that his presence there was known. Calling the other man into the car, with his assistance, he lifted the box to the top of a pile of freight where the thief would find it difficult to get out without making a noise. "Mummy!" he thought, smiling grimly. "I'll make a genuine mummy of him if he doesn't surrender when he comes out of that box."

When the train started he drew his chair into a dark corner of the car where he could not be seen from the box, and with his shot gun across his knees, sat watching as intently as ever a cat watched for a mouse. Every noise however faint smote harshly on his excited nerves, and more than once he raised his gun only to find no cause for alarm. Slowly the hours dragged by; midnight came, then two o'clock, and beginning to think that the thief did not mean to come out, Tom lowered his gaze from the box to the floor. How long he sat thus he could only conjecture, for minutes seemed hours; finally a faint, grating noise attracted his attention, and raising his eyes he was startled to see the top of the box slowly rising. Higher and higher it went until the box stood wide open, and a dim figure within it began moving about. Now a face appeared above the edge, a shrunken face upon which the yellow skin was shriveled and drawn, hideously distorting the features almost beyond resemblance to anything human—the face of a mummy.

Fascinated by the horrid sight, Tom sat still, gazing with protruding eyes. The repulsive thing slowly crawled out of the box, and down to the floor; then another followed that one, and another and another until half a dozen or more stood in the car, their sightless eyes turned upon Tom. Now they started toward him, and terrified, he tried to raise his gun, but his muscles refused to act; nearer and nearer they crept, their dry skins crackling and rattling as they moved. They panted, then as one, sprang upon him. A piercing shriek burst his lips, and leaping to his feet, he—awoke. Awoke to find his car turning over and over down an embankment, and parcels of every description, the splintered box, and a select assortment of Indian mummys filling the air and falling over him.

Tom escaped without bodily injury, but to this day he has not been able to decide from which his nerves received the greatest strain; the wrecking of the car, his dream, or his discovery in a wall of the shattered car of a rat's nest composed of bits of paper, mainly banknotes. He is a Superintendent himself now, and he attributes his promotion largely to his having found that nest.

THE UNFINISHED HOUSE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY MARY R. P. HATCH.

Copyright, 1900, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

I WAS taking a bicycle trip through a portion of the Connecticut river valley when, attracted by a pretty wood-skirted path, I branched off from the main road and into a narrow lane, following it until it ended in a pasture which was girdled by a stone wall and a set of four rudely hewn bars. Chagrined at this prosaic ending of my sylvan ride, I dismounted and was about to return the why I came, when, at a little distance, in what must have once been a cultivated field, I saw the ruins of a somewhat pretentious mansion. Surprised at its appearance here, far from the abodes of men and indeed shut off from the highway by pasture and woodland, I decided to go farther with a view to investigation.

To my surprise I found it to be a building which had been allowed to go to ruin before its completion. Half a century, at least, must have left its moss, ruin and rot to work its evil will on walls and casements, on floors and doorways. The ell had never been built, for a cellar, out of which grew poplar trees twenty feet high, yawned at the side of the square, finely modelled main part. Groups of maples and poplars of great size guarded the entrance and indeed, I was insensibly reminded of the enchanted palace where the sleeping Beauty lay waiting the coming of the Prince to awaken and marry her.

Smiling at my fancy, I decided to effect an entrance and ascertain whether the interior justified the romantic surrounding. I pushed on the door but the hinges were rusty and the old-fashioned latch would not lift. Setting my knee determinedly against the door, I gave a sudden lurch and it opened with so much force as to throw me heavily to the floor where I lay gasping with fear and horror. What was the cause I did not at the moment seek to realize. I was not hurt by my fall but from the moment the atmosphere of the ruined dwelling met me, I was overpowered with a subtle sense of distress and terror. There was something which I had never realized before, and, trembling and shaking in every limb, I arose to my feet and looked vaguely about me.

I appeared to have entered the long, low living room, or hall, which is a feature of the old-time dwellings of the better sort. An immense fireplace held sway at one side. On two sides there were the windowless apertures, only one of which was framed; on the fourth side were doorways to other portions of the house. Bare, bleak and uninviting as was the aspect of the room there was yet no sense of loneliness. On the contrary it seemed to be crowded with unseen forces surcharged with emotion of the most intense and harrowing kind. It was something like the spell that falls upon a large gathering of people when the stirring report of a battle is read. The hearts of the hearers beat as one, a picture of the battlefield with its smoke and grime and death-cries and rattle of musketry and yells of the fiercely charging shot is before each, and a pall as of black distress settles down for the moment over the vast crowd, until, with a sense of suffocation, a rush is made for the door.

So did I feel suffocated in this bare, bleak room; so did waves of horror, sympathy and distress beat upon my heart, compelling me to a realization of some incident of woe which I had not witnessed but which the unseen participants blazed into my very being. What it was I could not tell, but of one thing I was convinced. It was this: that, curious as the statement may seem to the reader, a direful tragedy had occurred some time in this house, probably in this very room. It was with difficulty that I at last succeeded in shaking off the spell which had seized me. I had my photographer's outfit with me. It was late in the afternoon, the sun was nearly down. I decided to have a picture of this weird, uncanny apartment, for my collection, and ride over from the hotel in the morning to take a photograph of the exterior. It would need a long exposure but this would insure a fine picture. I arranged the focus and carefully slipped in a plate just as the sun went down. It was so placed that a view of the fireplace and open doorway at the end would be produced.

As I worked, the feeling of horror let go its clutch on me somewhat and when ready to depart, I was quite restored to my usual equanimity but still that sense of not being alone was with me.

Closing the door carefully after me at length, I mounted my wheel and rode away, leaving inside the camera pointing dully yet mysteriously at the old fireplace as if its modern, up-to-date character were already changing into something in keeping with the room.

I did not speak of my adventure to any one at the hotel, though the landlord was a garrulous fellow who would, no doubt, have been glad to tell me all he knew about the old place; but I had no time that night for gossip as my weekly article for the Sunday Globe was overdue and must be written. Accordingly I wrote in my room until bedtime.

The next morning I rode over to the ruins and entered without experiencing the feelings of the previous visit in all their intensity. Still there was yet wafted to my senses on the moment of my entrance, that mysterious sense of occupancy, of another presence in the bare, grim, apartment.

Packing up my camera, after extracting the plates, I then took another look at the house, visiting the cellar, even, and the remote chambers. A thin flooring was laid and in the room directly over the living room, I observed in time to escape a severe fall, a broken board. Moved by curiosity I touched it lightly with my heel and found that sufficient pressure would precipitate one to the room below. I have said that I touched it with my heel. This you will readily believe, but not my next statement which I offer tentatively, so to speak, for I could at the time scarcely believe the evidence of my own senses, and at this remoteness of time, almost doubt its reality. But I heard it, yes, I am sure that I heard it, whatever may have been the possible disturbed state of my feelings at the time. I heard a deep, prolonged wail of agony ring out in that silent house which seemed to penetrate every part of the room. I felt my hair lift with horror. I stepped back affrighted, as if pushed to place by some invisible hand, and, giving one glance backward at the jagged broken board, I went down the unsteady and creaking stairs with more precipitation than was consonant with entire safety. All roads led to the living room. I turned my steps toward it and as if led by some unseen guidance went directly to the point which lay under the broken board, and which now for the first time I noticed in its relation to this room.

And then I glanced downward to the floor and again I saw something which had hitherto escaped my attention. It was a dark, deep stain on the floor, and the stain looked like blood.

At the sight there was that same curdling of the blood, the same lifting of the hair and again, or did I fancy it, the same wail of anguish which I had heard in the upper room.

I did not stop for further investigation. I had supped my fill of horrors. I rushed to the door, and taking my camera, mounted my wheel and rode away as if legions of demons were in pursuit. Strange ending of a bright morning in prosaic New England.

Before I reached the hotel I began to grow skeptical and to believe there were natural causes for the mysterious sights and sounds of the old house. A loosened casement swaying in the wind, a smear of paint on the floor might explain these, and my own susceptibility to supernatural fears to the hot biscuits, mince pies and doughnuts which largely made up the bill of fare at the hotel. So I was already returned to my usual equanimity and went immediately to my room to develop several plates, which I had on hand. These were soon dispatched and then came the last one taken. One glance at it and I looked about me dazed and uncertain. Was this the picture, the one with the old white haired, scholarly-looking man peering from the doorway at some object on the floor? It looked like a heap of drapery with something round and white at one end. Hastily drawing my microscope from my pocket I laid it over the spot and there lay exposed the white, still face of a woman. She was young, yes, and beautiful, and she lay there as if quite dead.

What tragedy was this and when had it taken place? Was it last night when my camera lay in wait to treasure up the secrets of that horrible room? Who could tell? Certainly not I.

Then, impelled by an eager fascination to see all my camera had revealed, I studied the old man's face. It was diabolical under the microscope and the patriarchal hair and beard but intensified the baleful look of the glaring eyes turned toward the prostrate figure, while the outstretched hands, with clawlike fingers, and bent form, lent to it a demoniac aspect. That the picture was a true representation I could not doubt. The plate had not been previously exposed and there was but one way to account for the picture. It was, it must be, a representation of what had actually taken place in that room. I decided to make inquiries regarding the ruined house in hopes to hear something which might throw light on the subject.

The first person I encountered on going down stairs was an old man who "done chores for his board" as the landlady had already informed me. Casually remarking that I had visited the old house in the fields his face lighted up with interest.

"I wanter know," he said. "Wall, times has changed some sence Dr. Talbot set out to build that ere house."

"Why was it never finished?" I asked.

"Wall, that's somethin' that don't nobuddy reelly know. Some says his money gin out and some says his niece bein' killed there sorter gin 'im a shock he couldn't git over in a hurry."

"Niece killed?" I repeated, galvanized to the most intense interest.

"Yes; you see she was turrible rich an' he was to have her money 'cordin' to the will dockyments, if she died unmarried or before she was twenty-one. Dr. Talbot was rich himself, had hundreds of acres of wild land but folks said his fingers got to itchin' after his niece's money. There was talk all along an' when she was killed there in the house after she'd rode over with the doctor to see it, naturally there was a lot more talk. The doctor was took up an' examined, but Lor'! they couldn't find nothin' agin him! Most like it was as he said. She stepped on a board that was cracked clear across it and fell through. There was them that said the fall never killed her and there was a turrible big bruise on her head as if she'd ben struck. But then again the doctor said she struck on her head when she fell. Wall, nobuddy knows to this day but anyway, Dr. Talbot, he never finished the house and he died the very year follering."

"Did the doctor have a family?"

"Yes, he did; six childun, four boys an' two girls, and that, to my mind's the strangest part on't."

"I don't understand," I at length replied, for the old man had picked up a straw from a crack and was slowly chewing it, evidently lost to all but his own reflections.

"Hey? What say?" he asked, as I repeated my questien.

"Wall, about them childun, the doctor was rich when he died but his widder and them childun run through the whole property in less than two year. Fack! Mis' Talbot died at the county farm. Ducia is there now (room's all fixed up first rate with canaries and fancy work, they say. The overseer is real good to her. I'm thinkin' of goin' there pretty soon). An' Adelaide (she's dreadful han'som') turned out bad an' has gone, nobuddy knows where. Bill, he's in the Soldier's Home, Confeld is on the town down to Morway. Put (his hull name is Putnam) is a mean scalliwag of a tramp, comes round onct in a while. He won't work and he ain't above baigin'. Mis' Dean here to the tarvern han's him out cold victuals, I've seen her. Wall, I guess Mis' Dean is gettin' pretty riled by this time about her firewood," and the old man trudged off with bowed back and his arm full of wood.

I shall add no comments to the story as told by the camera and the old man. If there is a supernatural element, why then the matter is cleared up. If not, I see no explanation. In either case, it overflows with mystery.

CHILD WIVES.

THE PATHETIC PICTURE DICKENS DREW.

Of all the characters evolved from the master mind of Charles Dickens, there is perhaps none which can rival in its pathetic interest, that of Dora, the "Little Blossom." She found the wedding ring grow too heavy for her little hand, and in spite of the lavishness of a husband's love, she faded away just like some sweet blossom nipped by untimely frost.

The pathos of the child-wife's history reaches its climax in that last interview with her husband. David sits on the bed side, and thus the story is told:

"She looks into my eyes and speaks very softly, 'I am afraid dear I was too young. I don't mean by years only, but in experience and thoughts and everything. I was such a silly little creature. I have begun to think I was not fit to be a wife.'

"I try to stay my tears and to reply, 'Oh, Dora, love, as fit as I to be a husband.'"

"I don't know," with the old shake of the curls, "Perhaps! But if I had been more fit to be married I might have made you more so too. I was very happy, very, but as the years went on my dear boy would have wearied of his child-wife. She would have been less and less a companion to him. I know I was too young and foolish. It is much better as it is."

Poor little Dora! The sweet little blossom faded and fell. But how many women wake up to a realization of the burden of marriage, crying with Dora, "I was not fit to be a wife," and live on through years of misery and suffering.

UNFITNESS FOR MARRIAGE

is the cause of much of the unhappiness which is so frequently ventilated in the divorce courts. The young woman, knowing nothing of physical disabilities enters into the marriage obligation to wake from her dream of love and happiness, to a realization of possibilities of suffering hitherto unknown.

"About ten years ago I was married and three months later I became miserable, but I did not know what was the matter with me," writes Mrs. John Hemmis, of Munson Station, Pa. "I was so sick and nervous, was not able to do any work at all; had to hire it all done. My husband's mother had been using your remedies, and one day she came over to see me and brought some of your 'Favorite Prescription' with her, and she said, 'Take that medicine—I know it will help you.' I took it and it did help me and I got better of the bad feelings that I had before I commenced taking it; was soon able to do my work myself. I took the medicine right along till after confinement, and I can safely say that Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is better than all the other doctors' medicine put together. Now I am happy and well and the people who saw me before when I was sick and see me now have said—'How well you look,' and they ask me what I got to make me so well. I quickly tell them what made me better. It used to be before I used your medicine that every month I had severe pains and then the hemorrhage would stop and in a day or two come back again, and so on for a week at a time, and I would have to lie in bed, but now that is all over. I can go ahead with my work as if nothing was the matter. I will ever be thankful to God and you for having such remedies to help poor suffering invalids like I was myself."

THE YOUNG WIFE'S DANGER

commonly grows out of neglect of conditions which seem to her trivial. But every variation from the normal, in the womanly functions is a prophesy of evil to come. Irregularity in the girl is often the beginning of a deranged condition, which in wifehood opens the way to serious disease. Inflammation comes and ulceration to be followed by that condition of general disease known as "female weakness." No woman is fit to be married in whom the womanly function is not regular and healthful. The use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription insures this regularity and more than all, gives positive strength and vigor to the womanly organs.

"I wrote you for advice February 4th, 1896," writes Mrs. Loma Haistead, of Claremore, Cherokee Nat., Ind. Ty. "I was racking with pain from the back of my head down to my heels. Had hemorrhage for weeks at a time, and was unable to sit up for ten minutes at a time. You answered my letter, advised me to use your valuable medicines, viz., Dr. Pierce's 'Favorite Prescription,' 'Golden Medical Discovery,' and 'Pleasant Pellets,' also gave advice about injections, baths and diet. To my surprise, in four months from the time I began your treatment I was a well woman and have not had the backache since, and now I put in sixteen hours a day at hard work."

WHY DO WOMEN WAIT

when they discover the first symptoms of the diseases peculiar to their sex? The question is not hard to answer. Women wait because they dread to face the unpleasant questions, the indelicate examinations, and the obnoxious local treatment which their friends have undergone at the hands of some local physician. Woman's modesty is affronted by these things, and disease is allowed to go unchecked. Dr. Pierce has earned the undying gratitude of thousands of women who have taken advantage of his offer of free consultation by letter, and have been treated and cured as was Mrs. Halstead, without having to submit to questions, examinations and local treatments, offensive to every modest minded woman, and only submitted to when there seems no other way of escape.

If after undergoing all the mental martyrdom attending on such treatment, the suffering woman could be sure of a cure, it would be some consolation to her outraged feelings. But the average local practitioner can make no allowance for the differences in women. He treats them all alike, strong and weak, and makes no allowance for the delicately constructed woman, whose fine organization revolts at the crudity of his methods. The use of "Favorite Prescription" and Dr. Pierce's treatment have resulted in cures where physicians and surgeons have been entirely baffled and helpless.

NOTHING LIKE IT.

It can be claimed without equivocation or reservation that no put-up medicine specially for woman's use sold by dealers, has been so wonderfully successful in curing the diseases of women, as Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It regulates the periods. It heals inflammation and ulceration. It cures female weakness. It strengthens the nervous system, so that there is no more nervousness. It gives a healthy appetite and sound, refreshing sleep. For prospective mothers it is invaluable, giving them strength for the coming ordeal, which is made practically painless through the use of "Favorite Prescription." Its tonic effects are no less marked, and nursing mothers find it a source of vitality which makes the nursing of the baby a ceaseless pleasure, instead of a painful drain upon the vital powers.

Sick women suffering from chronic ailments are invited to consult Dr. Pierce, by letter, free of charge. All letters are read and answered in private, and their contents are held as strictly private and sacredly confidential. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

There is no alcohol in "Favorite Prescription," neither does it contain opium, cocaine or any other narcotic. It is a true temperance medicine.

Accept no substitute for Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. The dealer who tries to substitute a "just as good" medicine does so only because it pays him an extravagant profit. He gets an honest profit on an honest medicine when he sells you "Favorite Prescription." Insist upon having the honest medicine, in self-protection.

A WOMAN'S FRIEND.

The best book on health, hygiene and physiology which a woman can have is Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser. It answers the natural questions of the womanly heart. It points the way to happiness in marriage, and healthy motherhood. This great book, containing 1008 large pages, is sent free on receipt of stamps to pay expense of mailing only. Send twenty-one one cent stamps for the book in paper covers, or thirty-one stamps for cloth binding. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

SUSANNAH.

A Story of the Fort Hammond Massacre of 1675.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY SARAH E. GANNETT.

Copyright, 1900, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

SUSANNAH! Susannah! Drat the girl! Where has she gone now? She is more like a parched pea than ever in her movements this morning. Here I am with my hands in the butter, the cruller fat's like to be in the fire, and those pies are burning in the oven, I'm positive," and good Dame Hammond hastily freed her hands from the butter she was working, snatched the skillet of fat from the fire and set it to one side in the ashes, then seized the long handled shovel and reached far into the depths of the big brick oven for the scorching pies. She was just setting the last one on the white kitchen table when Susannah appeared in the doorway.

"My patience, wench!" exclaimed the good lady. "Is it fools' holiday with you to-day that you do so neglect the work? Shame upon you for a runaway that you are, and me with more than I can possibly do with one pair of hands at my call."

"I crave your pardon, mistress," replied the young girl, gently. "I did but go to the brow of the cliff to look for Indians. My mind misgives me sorely but they are lurking about here; and I much fear they intend to fall upon us as soon as night be come."

"And pray, what reason have you for thinking thus darkly of the Indians to-day? We have never had trouble from them, and they ever seem friendly. Why are you so uneasy? Have you seen aught awry?"

"Naught but little things. Rover sniffs suspiciously about and barks at the underbrush; the cattle are uneasy, and toss their heads and low; the horses will not stay in the lower pasture and feed, but are huddled together in this end of the paddock with their necks stretched toward us over the stone wall. I wish the men were home from the fields, and I wish you would let me call the children within the stockade and close the gate."

"Nonsense, Susannah! Why do you worry so much about the Indians? They are perfectly inoffensive. They are fond of us, I tell you, girl, and wouldn't hurt one of us."

"I do not feel so sure of that, indeed I do not. Only a few weeks ago I heard Mr. Davis say that the Indians think Mr. Hammond cheats them in trade, and does not give them a fair bargain for their furs; and they have threatened to be revenged upon him," and the tears stood in the eyes of the young girl.

"Say you so? Why have I never heard of this?"

"I did not like to give you the ill news unless there was really cause for anxiety; but I have watched, oh, I have watched so closely by day and by night! Please let me call the children in and fasten the gate."

Mrs. Hammond did not answer at once, but stepped to the door, shaded and protected by the protruding upper story of the house, and gazed about at the distant woods and the blue Kennebec flashing and glittering in the August sun, and spreading wide, above the Narrows, into Merrymeeting Bay. A movement on the further shore startled her, and she hastily stepped without the stockade to look for the children. They were not to be seen, but Susannah ran lightly down the cliff side to the water's edge, and soon reappeared carrying a little girl of three years while two other children clung to her skirts and impeded her movements as she climbed. Mrs. Hammond half laughed as she nervously caught her baby to her breast and kissed her.

"See how you have frightened me, foolish girl. I thought I saw Indians on the western bluff there, but it was naught save the bushes moving in the wind. However, we will be on the safe side and take the children within. I fear me they like it not, though," she added, as all three began to whimper at being taken away from their delightful play.

"Now, Susannah," she continued, as the gate was made fast, "we must make up for lost time. The oven must be heated again for bread, the crullers must be fried, dinner is to get and clear away, and all that flax must be spun before dark," and the two women went to work with a will; the only sounds heard for some time being the rattle of dishes and the clatter of their stout shoes on the puncheon floor. But after dinner, as they busied themselves at their flax wheels in the wide, cool upper room, while the children played quietly in one corner, their anxious looks would stray over fields, woods and river, and they talked together in low tones of their suspicions.

"Indeed, I wish the men were home!" at last exclaimed Susannah. "Where are they this afternoon, Mrs. Hammond?"

"I heard Mr. Hammond say, at noon, that he and Francis Card and son Herediah would be at the mill, grinding. James and Samuel are with John Dean in the blacksmith shop, and the other four men are in the fields at work. They'll be tired enough when they get home, for the sun is hot to-day."

The long summer afternoon wore slowly on, and sunset found the family of sixteen souls all at home in the fortified house; the animals and fowls fed and fastened securely in their sheds inside the stockade, the children in their beds, and the older people weary and longing to follow them. To all the fears and pleadings of Mrs. Hammond and Susannah the men gave scant attention.

"Nonsense, girl!" cried Mr. Hammond; "The Indians mean no harm to us. They are cowards—the Indians around here. They dare not attack us, even were they disposed to do so. But they have no such wish. They know too well on which side their bread is buttered."

"But Mr. Davis told me that they think you cheat them in buying their furs, and they are angry and mean to be revenged."

"Oh, fudge! Don't believe all you hear. Davis was always a tale-bearer and scandal-monger, and this time, as in many another, he has heard more than any one else."

"Well, Richard," said his wife, "I hope you are right, but I cannot feel safe to-night."

"I'm sorry, good wife, for your fears, but I am too tired to sit up to watch with you;" and, kicking off his shoes, the worthy farmer turned into his bedroom, and his deep snores soon told of his heavy sleep.

One by one the men followed his example, and soon only the two women and the oldest son of Mrs. Hammond by a former marriage, James Smith, were left in the kitchen. James was as tired as the others, but he would not leave the women to watch alone, although he did not believe the reports or share their anxiety. At last, he, too, succumbed to weariness, and lay like a log asleep on a settle.

About nine o'clock Susannah's fears so overcame her that she stole without the stockade to look about a little. As she stood in the shadow of the gate peering around she was violently startled at the sight of three Indians coming towards her, while two or three others hovered in the distance. The leader spoke to her, and she recognized him as one who frequently traded with Mr. Hammond.

"What for young squaw frightened? Me no hurt. Me good Indian. Me Tasset. Young squaw know me. Me come to trade skins; see?" and he pointed to the packs they carried. "We walk long way—just come. We sleep here—to-morrow we trade; see? No be frightened." And he led her gently to the gate, which she had left ajar, and shut her in.

Mrs. Hammond was so far reassured by Susannah's story of her talk with Tasset, added to the confidence of the men, that she concluded they had been too easily frightened and both she and James went to bed. Susannah, too, went upstairs, but she could not sleep and often rose and crept to the window; and her suspicions grew as she noted more and more dusky forms in the distance.

At last she could bear it no longer. It was of no use to arouse the family, they would not believe her; so she crept softly downstairs and out of the house. She could at least fly to Sheepscot for help if they were attacked, and also save the Sheepscot colony from a like fate by putting them on their guard. As she opened the gate she shivered with dread of what might be behind it, but no one stopped her, so she slipped through, shut it—thereby shutting herself out of the safe shelter of the fort, for the latch-string was drawn inside—and sped swiftly to a field of tall corn near by, in which she concealed herself, and waited, trembling.

From her hiding-place she could see the dusky forms gathering in the darkness and surrounding the stockade. More and more of them appeared and at last she saw them setting up tree trunks against the stockade, over which they scrambled to the top of the wall, and one by one they silently dropped inside.

Soon sounds of blows, of screams and of scuffling came to her ears and she turned and ran. Through the cornfield, down the hill, over rocks and briers she sped—now splashing through the brook, now striking against trees in the darkness, now tripping against a stone she stumbled and fell, bruising herself badly, but she could not stop for those terrible screams rang in her ears, and the thought that all whom she held dear were dying—murdered by the cruel savages—spurred her on. Often she thought she heard the Indians behind her and the fear of falling alive into their hands was too dreadful to contemplate for a moment. So, although her strength was almost gone she kept on, scratched, bruised, breathless and bleeding; and just as day was breaking, she dropped, almost senseless, at the door of Jabez Stinson at Sheepscot River, and gasped out her terrible story. Warned by her the settlers quickly armed themselves to resist an attack, but none came.

At the fort the Indians, who were of the Kennebec tribe and not so fierce and bloodthirsty as other tribes in the vicinity, contented themselves with killing only the two men against whom they had a grudge—Richard Hammond and Samuel Smith. The others they took captive, rifled the house, fired it with all the surrounding buildings and departed. Part of them remained with the captives and conducted them to their wigwams up the river, while the remainder went south to Arrowsic Island, where they continued the work of pillaging and destruction.

On the way up the river, one rainy night, Francis Card escaped in the darkness, made his way to Boston and told there the story of the massacre and the pillage and destruction of the fort. Of only one of the household, Susannah, could he give no account. The last seen of her by any one was when she climbed the ladder to her sleeping room, three hours before the Indians burst in upon them. He said to the Governor that Susannah had been sure all day that the Indians would attack them that night and that she must have stolen downstairs and outside the stockade to watch after all the family were asleep, and been killed by the Indians to prevent her giving the alarm to those inside the fort. She had been out once during the evening for the purpose, and the devils sent her back indoors then with fair and gentle words.

Nearly a year passed by and June had spread the land with her fairest flowers, when a little company of ragged, sunburned pilgrims might have been seen making their way into Boston. Footsore they were and weary, but their faces shone and their eyes sparkled with the joy of freedom. At their head walked Mrs. Hammond, bearing in her hand a letter—illiterately written and expressed—from the Indian chiefs to the Governor of Boston, freely surrendering unharmed, the twenty prisoners accompanying it, but setting forth, in a pathetic way, the wrongs and deprivations to which they themselves had been subjected by the whites.

Out upon the streets of Boston poured its people, eager to welcome the returning captives; and foremost among them, with outstretched hands and joyous words, were Francis Card and Susannah—his newly married wife—whom he had found in the home of the Sheepscot farmer, Jabez Stinson, and had wooed and won during the past winter.

COLONEL AND VOLUNTEER.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY F. E. BURNHAM.

Copyright, 1900, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

FISKE was one of a company of volunteers that went to the front when the war with Spain began. His company left home one morning in June, followed by the prayers and good wishes of fathers and mothers, sweethearts and wives. Every man of them was brave after the tears and handshakings were over and they were fairly off; every man was eager to smell the smoke of battle and help avenge the destruction of the Maine.

The spiteful hiss of a mauser bullet and the smoke from the first skirmish changed all this, and more than one wished to himself, if he did not wish openly, that the hills of Vermont were nearer, and the dusty roads of Cuba removed to the other end of the Universe.

Fiske stepped into the colonel's tent one evening after a slight engagement with the enemy; he was pale and his voice trembled, though he strove desperately to control it.

"Pretty sharp fight, this, Colonel!" said Fiske, shifting uneasily from foot to foot.

The colonel glanced up from his writing.

"Salute!"

"O, I forgot, Colonel."

"You don't want to forget. Salute!"

Fiske obeyed, saluting with precision that would have done credit to a West Pointer.

"I say, Colonel, it was a sharp fight!"

"Do you call that a fight?" replied the colonel, contemptuously, "that was only a skirmish. Were you scared?"

"No, not scared, but——"

"Nervous, eh?" suggested the colonel. "It's too bad your mother isn't here to chirk you up."

Fiske flushed hotly, but did not reply. Instead, he strode angrily out of the tent. He was furious. At home the colonel was a different man, one to whom he could freely talk—a neighbor. Now all was changed. The colonel was all importance and his seeming arrogance was unbearable. A short distance from the colonel's tent Fiske met several men from his company.

"Swallowed a ramrod, Bert?" asked one, noting Fiske's erect carriage.

"No," replied Fiske, "but I guess the colonel has. When he was getting us together, it was Mr. Jones and Mr. Fiske and Mr. Somebody Else; now it's—Salute!"

"Don't mind, Bert," said one of the men, good naturedly, "when it comes to the scratch there won't be any saluting; it'll be each man for himself and bullets for the sneaking Spaniards. There's going to be a battle soon, and somebody is going to get hurt."

"That's just what I think," said Fiske, his voice dropping, "it's mighty lonesome way down here, boys."

The men understood, but there was not one among them to suggest what the colonel suggested. Perhaps some of them were in Fiske's frame of mind.

"Here's a letter for you, Fiske," said the mailcarrier as Fiske passed on his way to his own tent.

Fiske's eyes lighted up as he noted the backing of the envelope. It was from home, one he had been expecting for several days, and he hastened to his tent.

The letter:

"MY DEAR SON:—Here at home we are watching the movements of the army with the interest which only those who have sons and husbands at the front can understand. You are far from here, many hundred miles, but the same love that cared for you at home surrounds you while on the battlefield.

"It is a terrible thing, this war, taking each others' lives, but duty demands that some one shall go to war, and you have gone. Be brave, my son, even as we have faith that you are brave.

"Sophie says that you will be the last one to fear of all those who went from here. She reminds me of the time you risked your life on the lake and saved the children.

* * * * * * *

"Your father adds a word, hoping that it will find you well and of good courage."

"MY BRAVE SON:—

"I wish I was down there with you; it would seem like old times. Some of the boys will be scared when they hear the whistle of the bullets, but don't you mind; follow the flag and know that the good wishes of everybody here follow you.

"Sock it to the yellow-jackets, Bert.

Your loving father."

Fiske read the letter several times and then slipped it into his pocket. Somehow with the reading of the letter the fear that had fast been gaining possession of him departed and he felt that he could face a regiment of Spaniards armed with mauser rifles.

The following day there was a battle. Fiske was asleep when some one roughly shook him.

"Get a hustle on, old boy, our company is about to start to the front to meet the enemy. You've overslept, Bert."

In less time than it takes to tell it, Fiske had slipped on his shoes and strapped up his blanket and few belongings; a few moments later he had joined his comrades.

The fight was on in less than an hour. Bullets began to whistle and it was not long before some of the men began to drop, one here and one there, like stray leaves falling in the early autumn. Suddenly Fiske felt a sharp pain in his thigh and the next instant he was lying on his back. The company had swept onward with the rest of the regiment.

Presently Fiske looked about him. Others had fallen, too, among them an officer. Fiske dragged himself along the ground until he reached the side of the man. It was Colonel Brice.

"Tough fight, Colonel," said Fiske, raising himself on his elbow.

"You, Fiske?"

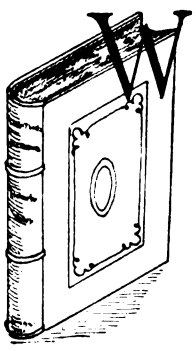
"Fiske it is," said the young man, saluting as well as he could under the circumstances.

"Yes, comrade," replied the Colonel, "this has been a fight."

For a few moments the Colonel wrote with a pencil on a bit of paper, now and then pausing to rest. Suddenly he stopped and turned to Fiske, who was trying to stop the flow of blood from his wound.

"Here, Fiske," said he, "keep this; I'm not going to be here long. I thought you were a coward, Fiske, but—but I was mistaken. Tell, well, tell—oh, I don't know, I guess I'll go to sleep."

This was the paper that Fiske brought home from war, the paper Colonel Brice had given him:



"Fiske is a hero. The wound in the back signifies no cowardice. The flag dropped and he stooped to raise it. He was shot while in the act.

COLONEL J. N. BRICE."

"IN TILL—"

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY A. M. BARNES.

Copyright, 1900, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

"WHAT conclusions, Palgrave?"

"None whatever, Pentwick. I have drifted even further out to sea."

"Well, we must find headlight somewhere. Read the slip again."

Palgrave picked up the slip of parchment, crumpled and partly soiled. It had been hurriedly torn from a sheet legal cap size, and presented quite an uneven appearance, the wider end being about two inches in depth, the other no more than one. With a voice pitched unnecessarily high, Palgrave read the words on the slip:

"£17000 are in Till—"

Here it ended abruptly, even more so than Palgrave's thin voice, which broke into innumerable little dying quavers.

"He says there are £17000 in the till. That accounts for no more money being visible when his effects were gone through. Every one knows that Sirius Crabstone was a wealthy man."

"But we have searched the till."

"I know; and found nothing. But there may be a secret drawer, a false back, or something of that kind. Let us go again for a search."

They left the sitting-room, and descended to the lower or ground floor. Here, at one time, Sirius Crabstone had carried on quite an extensive cabinet business. He had been fond of the work; could make all kinds of rare, beautifully carved furniture, which was in much demand for the homes of the rich planters living up the Cooper and Ashley. He had made a fortune before he hardly knew it. Being more ardently a student than an artisan, he at length gave up his trade to bury himself in books, their delights having long allured him.

He had no kith or kin near him. The only relatives he was known to have were two nieces in an adjoining state. One of them had occasionally visited him. Except for the domestic who attended his wants, he lived entirely alone.

Sirius Crabstone had left his will duly signed and witnessed. There was no trouble about that; all was clear and to the point. Most of the furniture of his house and £2000 in the hands of a private party at interest he left to the Home of the Aged; his books, with some exceptions, to the Apprentices' Library. The balance of the money was to be equally divided between his two nieces, after one fourth had been deducted as a legacy for his old friends, Palgrave and Pentwick, ship-builders, who were named as executors of the will.

But where was the money?

He had written that it was "In Till—," meaning the till, or money-drawer, of course; seventeen thousand pounds of it. There it was plainly enough on the crumpled bit of parchment that had been found beside him when he died. He had evidently purposed to add more, but the stroke of death had fallen too quickly.

They had gone, of course, to the till in the old cabinet shop, for what other till could be meant? But though they had searched carefully and slowly, even taking the drawer out to look it over closely, not one pound could be found.

Again the executors had met and again they had come to search the till. This time they literally left nothing of it save chips and shavings. There were plenty of these, for the two worked hard and patiently, but not a vestige of money.

On the fifth day thereafter one of the nieces arrived, the one who had made him an occasional visit. When told of the matter her perplexity, too, was great. She thought long and deeply. Her face suddenly cleared, then shone radiantly. She knew her uncle's habits better than any one. What was a puzzle to the others was no longer a puzzle to her.

"Oh, I have it now!" she cried. "Why didn't I think of it before?"

"What?" questioned Mr. Pentwick eagerly.

"Listen and I will tell you."

"Wonderful!" he exclaimed when she had finished. "It takes a woman every time," and he bowed profoundly to Miss Crabstone.

"Can it be possible?" cried Mr. Palgrave who was still in doubt. "It seems almost incredible!"

"Put it to the test and see," suggested Miss Crabstone, with a little gurgling laugh of the deepest enjoyment.

Suddenly Mr. Palgrave's face clouded.

"Consternation!" he cried, "why, it has been sold!"

"When? Where?" and Miss Crabstone started up in alarm.

"Why, do go at once," entreated Miss Crabstone, "and buy it back. Offer any price, any reasonable price, I mean."

"Don't be alarmed," assured Mr. Pentwick. "If it is there he will restore it, and at the price paid for it. The danger is that he has sold it to another."

Mr. O'Hara, the honest, genial Irishman, was in his Curiosity Shop. His wares, of all sizes, sorts and conditions, were piled from floor to ceiling. One point about Mr. O'Hara was that he never kept anything in order. How he ever found what was wanted was one of the mysteries known only to himself. But the people liked to go to his shop just to talk with him, even when they did not desire his wares, for he had much-lore on many subjects.

It was on the same evening of the interview that Mr. Palgrave, pale and flurried, appeared in the Curiosity Shop of Mr. O'Hara.

"Article 91, Lot 7967, what have you done with it, O'Hara?"

Mr. O'Hara's thin face showed surprise at the rather abrupt question. Then he took his fingers several times across the lids of his eyes.

"Article 91, Lot 7967," he repeated, and for once—wonderful to say—Mr. O'Hara remembered.

"Sold," he continued after a moment, "sold the day before yesterday to a gentleman from up the Santee."

"His name?" gasped Mr. Palgrave.

"'His name?'" repeated Mr. O'Hara, "'his name?'" "Why, I never thought to ask it. It was a cash transaction, you see. Fancy now, Palgrave, a merchant demanding of every chance customer his name!" and Mr. O'Hara looked duly aggrieved. "The only way I knew he was from up the Santee was from hearing him ask about the boat."

Mr. Palgrave rushed away in hot pursuit of the gentleman from up the Santee, never stopping to think that in Mr. O'Hara's hands rested the chief end of the thread of the clue, its beginning. For how was he to trace even the departure from the city of the gentleman from up the Santee without a description of said gentleman?

In two days, convinced of the folly of his mode of pursuit, he returned to Mr. O'Hara for the information he ought to have asked at first. This time with him came Mr. Pentwick.

"'How did look?'" repeated Mr. O'Hara. "Tall, dark, heavy-browed, stoop in the shoulders and catch in voice; wore a dark brown suit, ruffled shirt front, black silk hat, and carried a cane with a griffon's head. But man alive!" broke off Mr. O'Hara, "what do you want to know all this for now when Article 91, Lot 7967 has been returned as unsatisfactory—"

"Ah!" exclaimed Mr. Palgrave blandly.

"And sold again," finished Mr. O'Hara serenely.

"What?" Mr. Palgrave almost leaped from the floor, while Mr. Pentwick fairly gasped.

"Yes, sold again; this morning, not much more than two hours ago. First party not satisfied; second party highly so."

"Heavens, man!" cried Mr. Palgrave, hopping about like a pea on a shovel, "when you had your hands on it again why didn't you keep it? I would have given you three—yes, five, ten times the amount you paid for it."

"Bother your money!" retorted Mr. O'Hara somewhat rudely. "If you wanted the thing why didn't you say so at first!"

"I thought I did."

"You didn't. You came and inquired about Article 91, Lot 7967, which you yourself sold me among others some seven or eight days before. When I told you it had been purchased, you asked name of purchaser which I couldn't give; whereupon you rushed away like a madman. If it were a re-purchase you had in view then why didn't you say so?"

"I thought my actions spoke it loud enough," declared Mr. Palgrave somewhat testily.

"Who was the last purchaser?" asked Mr. Pentwick. His head seemed to be the cooler of the two.

"A lady."

"A lady? Ha! well that is funny! Strange taste for a lady!" and Mr. Pentwick seemed on the point of fairly exploding.

"Describe her, Mr. O'Hara, please."

Mr. Pentwick spoke softly, soothingly, and Mr. O'Hara was appeased.

"Young, good-looking, dressed in gray, prominently arched nose, blue eyes, which were fairly aglow as she went away, for she seemed to think she had found a treasure."

"Miss Crabstone!" declared both Mr. Pentwick and Mr. Palgrave in a breath.

"Thank you, Mr. O'Hara," said Mr. Pentwick with a beaming smile. "It seems that all our troubles are more quickly over than we thought. We know the young lady."

But the troubles of the worthy executors, Messrs. Pentwick and Palgrave, were by no means over. Indeed, they were but little more than begun. On making inquiry of Miss Crabstone she declared she had never once been near the shop of Mr. O'Hara. She had trusted too completely in the alertness and tact of her uncle's executors to take any such hand in the matter. The young lady in gray was assuredly not herself, though she would own up to the similarity of the "rather prominently arched nose and blue eyes."

By the time Mr. O'Hara was appealed to again the trail had grown cold. All that he could tell was that the young lady lived in Meeting Lane and—yes, brilliant remembrance on the part of Mr. O'Hara! she had a brother who worked in the Mercury office. It had been but a casual mention on her part, but Mr. O'Hara retained it.

There might be a half dozen brothers in the Mercury office whose sisters lived in Meeting Lane, but the right one was found at last and the directions obtained.

The young lady turned pale when she saw the two grave, business-like gentlemen. What could they want with her?

"Yes," she said, feeling relieved when she knew the nature of their errand, "I bought it. I was delighted when I found it. I was looking for something of the kind for a dear old uncle who fairly dotes on such things."

"Ah!" said Mr. Pentwick blandly, "then that which we seek is within reach. I suppose your uncle has not yet had the time to examine it thoroughly?" looking at her anxiously.

"Very little, or that is so far as I know. I got it only this morning, as you are aware, and he was busy with other things."

"My dear Miss," said Mr. Pentwick, "we do not wish to disturb your uncle in the possession of his property, made so by your love and thoughtfulness," and Mr. Pentwick gave her a courtly bow, "but we wish to have the privilege of examining it for a few moments, for the purpose of recovering therefrom certain inclosures not known to be there at the time of sale, and which the one placing them there, since deceased, did not intend should remain. I assure you the property will in nowise be injured."

She looked perplexed but was evidently won by the appeal.

"I am sure there could be no objection to that," she said.

The countenances of the two worthy executors brightened. They had feared reluctance, even opposition.

"But I forgot," her manner excited. "It is not here. Why didn't I tell you sooner? Stupid of me I declare!"

"'Not here?'" repeated Mr. Pentwick in a dazed way.

"'Not here?'" echoed Mr. Palgrave.

"But it is assuredly near at hand?" questioned Mr. Pentwick, coming to himself.

"No, not exactly. You see, it is this way: I bought it for my uncle. He is a clergyman. His home is in the West. He has only been on a visit to us and——"

"Well?" Mr. Pentwick almost held his breath as he questioned.

"He started three hours ago on his return home."

"In what way?"

"By the stage, and——"

"Yes, my dear young lady, yes." Mr. Pentwick hadn't time for the sentence introduced by the "and." "Thanks for your kindness and patience. One more question please. Your uncle's name!"

"Daniel Calthorpe."

The two executors hastily bowed themselves out.

"To the livery, Palgrave, to the livery as fast as foot will carry us!" exclaimed Mr. Pentwick when they were on the street again. "We must have the two swiftest horses procurable."

But soon another perplexity presented itself. There were two stage routes to the West, the one by Monck's Corner, the other by Dorchester. Which way had the Rev. Daniel Calthorpe gone? To go by the office of each stage line would require an hour or more.

"We must appeal again to the niece," said Mr. Pentwick.

But the niece declared she really did not know. Exasperating loss of many minutes of precious time!

"Drive to Munn's Tavern," suggested Palgrave. "Both coaches stop there. We are armed now, fortunately, with a description of the reverend gentleman."

The clergyman was finally located in the coach going by Dorchester.

"Now for it!" cried Pentwick as he shook the reins over the backs of the horses.

It was now twenty minutes to two o'clock. The coach had started at ten.

"They can't go more than six miles an hour at best speed," declared Pentwick, "for we have heard they are well loaded. We ought to travel twice as fast at least. By half-past five at outside I think we can be having our interview with the Rev. Daniel Calthorpe."

"Suppose he enters serious objection?" said Palgrave.

"O I guess not, especially when he is assured that we mean no damage to his property."

At half-past four they were ten miles behind the Western coach.

"Tennet is certainly pushing his horses too tight," declared Pentwick, and somewhat irritably. "I shall make it a point to tell Vance about it. He loves his horses too well to keep such a driver in his service."

"Maybe the fault is with us," suggested Palgrave, "that we have not been making time as planned. I have noticed for some miles back that the chestnut was not traveling so freely."

"Doubtless that is what's the matter. Well, I don't want to hurt the horses, though the bay looks good for many miles yet."

Seven miles further on good news greeted them. They learned that the Western coach had broken down and had been considerably delayed. When at length they came in sight of it Pentwick could not restrain himself.

"Hello, driver," he shouted, "stop that coach!"

Tennet saw the two determined gentlemen in hot pursuit, and realizing the utter futility of an attempt to escape with his loaded team, at once gave warning to his passengers.

"Highwaymen, gentlemen, highwaymen! Save yourselves and your valuables!"

"Don't be a fool," said Pentwick as he came within speaking distance. "Calm yourself, Ike Tennet, and act the man. You assuredly know me, Pentwick of East Bay? O now I see you do. I have followed the coach solely on business, and that business is with an old gentleman within."

There were only six passengers besides the old clergyman, who was sitting on the back seat near the window, his right shoulder leaning toward it. His face was bent downward until only the top of his head was visible, and he was evidently so engrossed in what he was doing that he had not even heard the driver's alarm, nor noted the excited stir of the passengers about him.

"Don't be disturbed, gentlemen," said Pentwick suavely, as he opened the door of the coach. "I am no more a highwayman than any one of you. I am Pentwick of Pentwick and Palgrave, shipbuilders, East Bay, and I have come solely on a matter of business with this gentleman," indicating the clergyman as he spoke. "The Rev. Daniel Calthorpe, I believe?" giving that individual a gentle shake by way of attracting his attention.

At sound of his name and the touch of the hand upon his knee Mr. Calthorpe looked up inquiringly, inclining his body forward. As he did so some lettering on the back of that which had so engrossed him came plainly into view. They were four letters of a word. The letters were large and distinct, for they were in heavy black type. They were:

TILL——

"Mr. Calthorpe, excuse me," continued Mr. Pentwick, "your niece recently, nay, this very day, made for you a purchase which you value highly; indeed, that goes without saying as your present close attention to it indicates. Before it fell into the hands of your niece it was the property of one, now dead, who placed therein certain inclosures in keeping of others. The article was sold without this having been discovered. The inclosures are now of the utmost value to their rightful owners. I desire the possession of them, and in doing so I assure you, sir, upon my word as a gentleman that no injury whatever will befall the article itself. Mr. Calthorpe, will you permit me?"

The clergyman looked at Mr. Pentwick as though measuring him. A moment passed, then, with a sigh, he placed his treasure in the outstretched palm.

"You have enjoyed it very much?" questioned Mr. Pentwick.

"Very!" with unmistakable emphasis.

"Been nearly through it?"

"More than half way."

"And found nothing?"

"Nothing, sir? What can you mean?" The old clergyman was evidently aroused now. "Why, sir, are you so ignorant as not to know that those are the richest of their kind ever inclosed within binder's casket?"

"TILL—at last!" cried Mr. Pentwick jubilantly as he came back to where Mr. Palgrave was holding the horses.

He tossed the article upward as he spoke. Two lines of lettering came clearly before Mr. Palgrave's eye, a longer one, with a shorter beneath. How plainly he could read them both!

"TILLOTSON'S SERMONS.
Quarto-Sheep."

A moment later a sharp penknife was working industriously, though carefully, between lightly pasted leaves. When the task has been completed, across Palgrave's knee lay seventeen one thousand pound Bank of England notes.

The old clergyman received his book again with a clasp of delight. He never knew what had been within it, nor that he had read beyond ten at least of the pasted leaves without knowing it. So much for his comprehension of what was "In Till—"

JULES Verne has been married fifty-five years. Although he has, in his stories, allowed himself the wildest flights of fancy, he has always led the most quiet of lives and is now spending the evening of his days in Amiens, where he and his charming old wife are among the most prosperous and highly considered citizens of that famous place.

TINNED meats will keep sweet and good for many years. Mutton preserved in this way has been kept for forty-four years, and was found to be in good condition at the end of this time. The cans containing this meat were wrecked in 1824, and were cast ashore with other stores on the beach at Prince's Inlet. They were found by Sir John Ross eight years afterwards in good preservation, but were left there for sixteen years longer, exposed to all the changes of temperature which visit that shore—from 32 degrees below zero to 10 above. Then another ship visited the spot, found them and brought them to civilized lands again, where some of them are still kept as curiosities, and are sweet and good after the lapse of so many years, and after passing through so many vicissitudes.

A MATTER OF TASTE.

If a man really prefers to wear a collar that cost 25 cts. or even 15 cts. and pays a laundry to transform it into a hideous thing of torment and tatters—why—he can do it of course. But think of it! A linen collar will stand the average laundry from one to three times. If it endures three times that makes it wearable four times in all. Suppose it costs 15 cts.—a low price—when new, the three launderings at 1½ cts. each bring the cost of four times wearing to about 5 cts. a time. Meantime it has shrunk or stretched or acquired a saw tooth edge, or the button holes have torn out and much anguish of spirit has resulted. Four "Linene" collars would have looked as well, felt better and cost just half as much, to say nothing of saving in trouble. "Linene" collars and cuffs are sold by leading dealers and are made by the Reversible Collar Co., of Boston, Mass.

His Nerves Wore Out

F. J. Lawrence, of 435 Fourth Ave., Detroit, Mich., exchange editor on the Evening News, says: "I never really broke down while at this work, but one time I was in such a condition that my physician said I would have nervous prostration. I was in a bad way, my nerves seemed to give out and I could not sleep. I lost flesh and had a complication of ailments which baffled skilful medical treatment.

"One of my associates recommended Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and I gave them a trial. The pills gave me strength and helped my shattered nerves so that I could get a full night's rest. Soon after I began taking them regularly, the pain ceased, causing me to feel like a new man."

From the Evening News, Detroit, Mich.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are never sold by the dozen or hundred, but always in packages. At all druggists, or direct from the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y., 50 cents per box. 6 boxes $2.50.

Men, Women and Things.

CONDUCTED BY JENNIE MELVENE DAVIS.

Bessie Potter Vonnoh is one of three or four women who have the honor of being members of the National Sculpture Society. Miss Potter's success was won through her ability to give an "up-to-date" catchiness to statuettes. These tiny portrait statuettes were bright, piquant reproductions of the friends who frequented her studio. The pose and dress were reproduced in the clay and the little gems were soon in demand. Not only were they popular with the public but also with the critics. They had all the freedom of line of a statue. Miss Potter was born in St. Louis. Her work as a sculptor began in Chicago. In that city her studio was the meeting place of all the literary and artist element. One of her most pleasing statuettes is Julia Marlowe in the character of Juliet. Miss Marlowe scratched her signature in the soft clay so that it is an autograph portrait done in marble. Miss Potter made such a financial success of the work that was begun simply for amusement that she was able to take a European tour. On her return she opened a studio in New York. Miss Potter's face is full of life, vivacity and expression. Many of the artists of Chicago painted her portrait. Mr. R. W. Vonnoh the well-known portrait painter made many portraits of Miss Potter but the last one was of Mrs. Bessie Potter Vonnoh.

Brigadier General King has gained promotion and honor for his bravery and daring in the Philippines. In spite of this he is best known to the American public as Capt. King the author of the popular military novels. "Between the Lines," "The General's Double," "Kittie's Conquest," "Winning His Spurs" and "A War-time Wooing," are among his most widely read books. Gen. King's career has been one of active adventures and stirring scenes. It is his custom to keep a series of note books that record the daily happenings of his eventful life. When a new story is under way, General King looks carefully through his note books. As a result his books have become noted for their careful accurate pictures of army life. He writes rapidly in a form of short hand invented by himself and then talks the story into a phonograph. A typewriter then follows the dictation of the phonograph and General King corrects the dictated manuscript. General King has won great financial and literary success through the work that he declares was undertaken to give an education to his sons and daughters. General King comes of good colonial stock; on one side he is a descendant of Rufus King and on the other side he claims John Eliot the famous apostle to the Indians as an ancestor. The General is now fifty-five years of age, but he is so alert in bearing that he seems at least a dozen years younger. When the Civil War broke out he was a lad of sixteen. He left school and enlisted. President Lincoln gave him a cadetship at West Point. He graduated with honor but remained at West Point until 1866, as instructor in artillery. Then followed active duty at various posts until he was assigned to staff duty in New Orleans. Here he won his wife and he declares that all his success since then has been won because he tried to make one woman happy. He has seen active service in the Indian campaigns. Trouble from a wound received on one of the expeditions finally led him to ask for retirement from the service. This was granted and he became instructor in the University of Wisconsin. In 1895, he was appointed Adjutant General of Wisconsin and did excellent work in increasing the efficiency of the militia of that state. In 1898 at the outbreak of hostilities with Spain he resumed active military service as a Brigadier General of Volunteers. March 1, 1899, he was raised to the rank of Major General for "energy, bravery and efficiency" during the engagement with the Filipino insurgents on February 5, 1899.

New England has long been the literary center of the United States. Its children have spoken a message to the whole world. High on the roll of its literary workers stands the name of Louise Chandler Moulton. Her stories and poems have won her a place in the hearts of the people and sincere praise and appreciation from the most critical members of the world of letters. To please the great mass of humanity and the critical few is seldom the lot of writers. Louise Chandler grew up in a little Connecticut town. She was an only child, sensitive and imaginative, and trained in the stern faith of the Calvinistics. Novels, dancing, games were all considered worldly and irreligious. This somber background seemed to develop the child's love for all that was beautiful in the world about her. For nearly eight years she wrote verses and at last sent a poem to a paper in Norwich, Connecticut. She tells of the intense joy that came to her when she saw the verses in print—a joy that her after successes could not parallel. Once having tasted the pleasures of printer's ink the path seemed clear. Poems and sketches were published in various magazines. Her first book "This, That and the Other" was made up of these articles. Soon after the publication of this book, Mrs. Moulton attended Mrs. Willard's famous school at Troy, N. Y. During the year she became engaged to Mr. William Moulton the editor and publisher of a paper in Boston to which she had been a constant contributor. She was married a few weeks after leaving school. Her novel "Jim Clifford" was published the same year and was followed by "My Third Book." Mrs. Moulton proved that a literary woman may be a famous housekeeper. The well-known and touching poem "If I Could keep Her So" was written regarding a little golden haired girl who came to bless her home. Bedtime Stories, More Bedtime Stories, New Bedtime Stories, Firelight Stories and Stories Told at Twilight were inspired by the little daughter. In 1898 Mr. Moulton died. Mrs. Moulton's home in Boston is a center of social, artistic and literary life. Mrs. Moulton spends some time each year in London and her circle of friends there is distinguished and cosmopolitan. Mrs. Moulton has a charming personality and is often called a Southern woman. She has the soft slow speech and the languid manner of a woman of ease and luxury but back of it is the New England perseverance that has enabled her to do much severe literary work and to climb to success.

Sir Henry Irving is easily the first of living actors. His visits to this country are always marked by crowded houses and by the sight of long lines waiting for hours to buy tickets. His life story is one of effort but of effort crowned by artistic and financial success. As a child he was fond of recitation. Long before he had ever seen a theater he loved to declaim the ballad of Chevy Chase. When Irving was ten, his parents went to London, and for two years and a half he attended school. He did not lose his natural love for reciting and his most vivid remembrance of the school is associated with the entertainments where the pupils recited English classics. The boy was put into a commercial firm but found the tasks uncongenial. At this time he became a member of the City Elocution Class which was an association of young men with tastes similar to his own. The club gave many plays in Sussex Hall and young Irving thoroughly enjoyed the part he took in these amateur entertainments. His first visit to a theater was one of the most memorable experiences in his life. The intention to become an actor grew into certainty. When he was nineteen he began his stage career by playing a small part in Richelieu. For nine years he appeared in the Provinces, and during that period gave over 428 different parts. The amount of mental labor required to memorize that number of parts is simply prodigious. At the close of the period he was able to command seventeen dollars and a half a week and to feel that the salary represented fair progress. This was the school of hard experience that trained the foremost actor of this age. It was work and hardship and perseverance. Sir Henry Irving lately addressed the students at Harvard and his text was "Do, not dream." In 1866 Irving played his first London engagement. In the '70's, Irving raised a wild excitement in London over his interpretations of Shakespeare's leading characters. Many critics were against him and even the great daily papers had leading editorials on the topic. Irving finally succeeded in convincing even his most bitter critics that his interpretation, while departing far from old traditions, was true to art. Sir Henry Irving has been the manager of the Lyceum Theater for twenty-one years. Time and money have been lavished to make this theater perfect in all details. The large sums that Irving has received for his appearances outside of England have been spent upon this theater. Irving is beloved and respected by all who know him well. He has a large collection of theatrical prints said to be the finest in existence. He entertains liberally but the bulk of his capital has gone to make the Lyceum Theater what it is. He has played short engagements in America during this winter but his tour has been hurried as the duties of manager of the Lyceum Theater require his presence in London.

To be the author of a book of which over 3,000,000 copies have been sold is a remarkable thing. To be the author of a book that bids fair to work a social and religious reform is not less remarkable. Rev. Charles M. Sheldon has achieved the dual distinction through his book "In His Steps." The book has been translated into French, German, Swedish, Norwegian, Russian and Italian. Rev. Mr. Sheldon is forty-two years of age. He was born in Wellsville, New York, but his father who was a clergyman moved to Dakota and it is the spirit and method of the West that has shaped Charles Sheldon's work. His education was obtained at the famous Phillips Academy, Brown University and Andover. He spent some time in England and Scotland studying the life of the poorer people. His first charge was in Vermont. He was not content with the conservative methods of Christian workers and he at once began the work of getting in touch with his people, not alone through the pulpit but by personal contact with their daily lives. In 1888 he accepted a call to Topeka, Kansas. Here he pursued his idea of close personal knowledge of the people and their wants. He became a student at the college, he worked as a day laborer, he met the physicians and lawyers in their offices and he made it his business to have a knowledge of humanity gained from humanity and not from books. He took special interest in his work in the negro quarter of Topeka. Prizes were offered for the best kept lawns and houses and a free kindergarten was established through his efforts. In 1891 he began the plan of reading a chapter of a book to his congregation on Sunday evening. The chapter was written during the week. The first book that he read was called "Robert Bruce." It was followed in succession by Robert Hardy's Seven Days, The Twentieth Door, The Crucifixion of Philip Strong, John King's Question Class, His Brother's Keeper, and in 1896, In His Steps. Since this famous book he has written Malcolm Kirk, The Redemption of Freetown, One of the Two, The Miracle at Markham and For Christ and the Church. Each book has been read to his church congregation and the listeners have increased in number so that the church could be filled twice over. Mr. Sheldon has refused many tempting offers to lecture. He is not eloquent or attractive as a speaker but he possesses the unrivaled charm of intense sincerity. His sudden and world wide fame will not divert the man from the line of work he has mapped out for himself. He speaks at Christian Endeavor meetings and recently asked that the sum of $1,000,000 be raised in order to support a daily Christian newspaper along the lines mapped out "In His Steps." The sum of his belief and teachings were summed up in these words spoken to the graduating class of Washburn College. "What we do in the world is not worth doing unless it is done to the glory of God."

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

GREAT and hidden are the dangers which beset the mariner sailing in unknown seas. The loss of the cruiser Charleston off the Island of Luzon in the Philippines on Nov. 7th is an example of this truth. As the Charleston was sailing along that night on the regular patrol of the northern coast of Luzon, she ran upon an unchartered reef and immediately sank. The fore part of the vessel held close upon the reef, and the latter part filled and gradually sank. As usual in disasters to American ships, there was no panic in the crew, but on the contrary most remarkable discipline and presence of mind. While nearly everything on the ship was lost, not a single man was drowned but all quietly and in order escaped to the neighboring islands. A few days after the ship entirely disappeared, and it is supposed that her hold upon the reef under her bow lessened and that she slid off into deep water; thus every hope of saving her was abandoned. The Charleston was one of the oldest of the new navy ships, having been built in 1888. In 1889 she was commissioned as flagship in the Pacific squadron. She attained considerable celebrity during the time in which it seemed probable that we should have a war with Chili by running down the fast Chilian transport "Itata" which had coaled in one of the ports of California in defiance to our neutrality laws.

Two United States marshals, finding the "Itata" coaling, went aboard of her to protest and to stop the work. The captain of the transport immediately went to sea, taking the marshals with him. Difficult as the pursuit of a single vessel is upon the high seas, the Charleston effectually captured the "Itata" and brought her back to port. The relations between the two countries at the time became so strained that war seemed inevitable, but it will be remembered was averted by the common sense displayed by the people in both countries. The Charleston was a protected cruiser, 300 feet long and cost $1,017,000. She carried a main battery of six six-inch guns and two eight-inch guns, and was equipped with four torpedo tubes. She carried a complement of a little over 300 men, and was considered an effective vessel of her class. A few years ago her loss would have been almost irreparable, but at the present time the United States has 13 of a similar class of ships in the new navy, and so rapid is the improvement in modern naval vessels that ships of the Charleston's make and class are fast becoming old-fashioned. She will undoubtedly be replaced with a new vessel of more modern make by the present Congress.

THE LOST CRUISER CHARLESTON.

Another addition to our navy is a sister ship of the Kearsarge which was illustrated last month. The Kentucky is a first class battleship built by the Newport News Shipbuilding Co., of Virginia; she recently had her official trial trip and maintained a sustained speed of over 17 knots, which is about 20 land miles, for four consecutive hours. The tide was against her, and when this is figured out she will undoubtedly attain even better record than the remarkable figure above given. Great as this performance is, it would undoubtedly have been still more remarkable had it not been that there was a northeast storm and high sea raging at the time which must have had some effect to prevent her attaining the highest possible figure. Her return cruise from the trial gave the highest record at a cruising speed. It is doubtful if in the navies of the world there are two fleeter or stronger fighting machines than these two ships which will soon be in commission in the navy.

As the month closes, the condition of affairs in the Philippines has changed remarkably from what it was six weeks ago. At that time the American people were worried at apparent inaction of Gen. Otis, and previous to the elections many were half-hearted in their support of the administration's policy in regard to the islands. The result of the elections wherever the question of the Philippine policy came up was so strong in favor of the administration that its effect must have been felt among the insurgents. At the same time a most vigorous advance on the part of the American troops under Gen. MacArthur and Gen. Lawton formed a cordon around the insurgent armies. The objective point at first was Tarlac, which was occupied as a capital by the insurgent government. This was one of the many capitals which have been invaded by American troops. Tarlac was taken without any real fighting although there were a series of skirmishes in which we lost some of our soldiers and valuable officers. Among the latter was Major Logan, a son of the late Gen. John A. Logan, and one of the most brilliant officers in the American army. He had won considerable distinction in the Spanish war and still more in the Philippines. The whole nation sympathizes with Mrs. Gen. Logan who has lost an idolized son in his death.

GEN. MACARTHUR.

The rainy season in the Philippines continued longer than was expected, and the roads even at present are almost impassable. Notwithstanding this fact, most rapid and determined advances and sweeping use of cavalry have been made and the insurgents scattered until at this writing it is but little more than a bandit or guerilla warfare. The Filipino Congress dissolved itself, many of its members surrendering to American authorities and others fleeing to the mountains, but with the general understanding it was never to meet again. The chief members of the cabinet were captured or surrendered, and at the time of this writing Aguinaldo with an army of 2000 men is in full retreat with his men disheartened and deserting at every turn. By the time this paper reaches its readers he will have been captured, or escaped through the lines which is much more probable, and made his way to some other land. In all probability he will reach Hong Kong where he is safe from extradition, and it is to be feared will remain a thorn in the American flesh for a long time. It will be remembered it was from Hong Kong that he plotted the last insurrection against the Spaniards after he had been sent there on his word of honor that he would not molest that nation, after his unsuccessful earlier insurrection.

GEN. JOSEPH WHEELER.

The greatest praise is due to the earnest work of Generals MacArthur, Lawton and Wheeler, all of whom have shown great intelligence in the present campaign which is so full of successful results. Gen. Wheeler always commands the attention of the American public, and his recent public interview in which he called on Congress to immediately state in emphatic language that the Americans intended to hold the Philippines indefinitely, and that American law was to be maintained, has caused much comment. It is believed that this would be a wise step, in that it has been generally known and publicly stated that the insurgents were only held together by the idea that the retention of these islands by the Americans was generally unpopular in this country, and that should it be understood otherwise the insurgents would have no heart to continue their rebellion. The vigorous efforts of the Government in the tremendous increase of reenforcements evidently had its effect in disheartening the rebels.

The death of Vice President Hobart though not unexpected came suddenly and painlessly at last. President McKinley immediately issued a proclamation relative to it and flags were displayed at half-mast throughout the country. His funeral was attended by all the high dignitaries and foreign representatives and the high position he had won both as an official and as a private citizen was very manifest. His funeral was notable in one respect, being the occasion of lowering flags on almost every legation, a courtesy seldom extended to any public man.

HON. WILLIAM PITT FRYE.

Mr. Hobart had been a very tactful man in the position he had held. The Vice Presidency is usually looked upon as a rather ornamental position in which a man may be conveniently shelved; but he made it an active and forceful part of the government and was something more than the usual figurehead. Being in full accord with the administration, he was able to aid and sustain it in legislation, constantly. It is unfortunately true that often the President and Vice President are chosen from opposite factions in the same party; and that, in consequence, their term of office is a state of armed neutrality, if not open warfare. In this case however entire harmony prevailed and was greatly to the interests of the country at large.

By Mr. Hobart's death, the President of the Senate, pro tem. Hon. William Pitt Frye, of Maine, becomes its presiding officer and practically acts as Vice President until March 4, 1901, when a new Vice President will take the oath of office. Mr. Frye has had long public service. He was in the Maine legislature and afterwards sent to Congress. In Maine it is a custom to keep men in Congress so long as they fill the responsible position with credit and as a consequence her delegation, being tried men, always has a strength and standing entirely disproportionate to their number.

In Mr. Frye's case the usual custom has been observed and after long service in the house, he was elevated to the national Senate, where he has served with great credit and distinction. He is a ready debater and one of the best speakers in America, being particularly forceful and popular on the stump. He recently was on the Peace Commission at Paris and aided in an early settlement of the Spanish war. In the Senate he later was instrumental in securing an early ratification of the peace treaty. He will be a tower of strength in the position and his ability as a presiding officer has been so fully demonstrated that there is no experiment in it.

DAVID B. HENDERSON.

Not only will the Senate in this Congress have a new presiding officer but the familiar form of Thomas B. Reed will no longer tower behind the Speaker's desk in the House of Representatives. For reasons personal to himself, Mr. Reed withdrew from public life on his return from a summer vacation in Europe, by resigning his seat. Several candidates for the Speakership immediately appeared, but the overwhelming strength developed by David B. Henderson of Iowa, made his nomination sure and all others withdrew leaving his nomination to be made by acclamation by the Republicans, who are in a majority. Mr. Henderson is a good orator, a parliamentarian and a born diplomat. He will not have the same kind of a personality that distinguished Mr. Reed, but will be a popular presiding officer, while his long public services, which have been eminently successful, assure the country of a brilliant and elevating term in the office to which he has been chosen. Gen. Henderson has served a number of years in Congress and has held a distinguished and prominent position in the many questions of public policy which have arisen.

Unusual interest has developed among Americans over the South African war and the columns of our newspapers are loaded with telegrams relating to it. The fitting of a hospital ship by American ladies in London and naming her the Maine was a graceful act of sympathy. The firm stand the United States has taken with the Boer government which declined to have our American representative act in British interests shows that Uncle Sam knows his power and is no longer to be trifled with. In all cases of war the retiring ministers of the belligerent governments leave their interest in the hands of a neutral government minister. In the late Spanish war British representatives acted for us, while the French acted for Spain. Kruger's attempt to overthrow this established usage was short-lived.

The condition of affairs in Cuba is less pleasing than it has been. The President's message, which has been remarkably well received by both the nation and by congress, indicates the immediate appointment of Gen. Wood as military governor of the island. The colored people are agitating immediate independence, while the property holders naturally want Federal supervision. Should these colored Marauders carry out any scheme of uprising, they will be taught the same lesson that the Filipino is learning of the difference between American and Spanish soldiers.

Our growing commerce and a balance of trade of $600,000,000 in our favor indicates a season of wonderful prosperity. The growth of our Eastern trade has compelled our government to address a note to each foreign government claiming a "sphere" in China as to its inventions. The "zone of influence" policy of foreign nations is to grab a large portion of China and restricts foreign trade from that province to that one country. England and the United States both stand by the "open door" policy, meaning that every country shall have equal rights with every other country in trading in any part of China; and that existing trade treaties with the Celestial empire will be maintained everywhere in the kingdom.

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

READ may or may not be the "staff of life," but we all know it holds an important position in our diet and we want it at its best.

There is no excuse for having sour, unpalatable bread. We give a recipe which makes two loaves of bread.

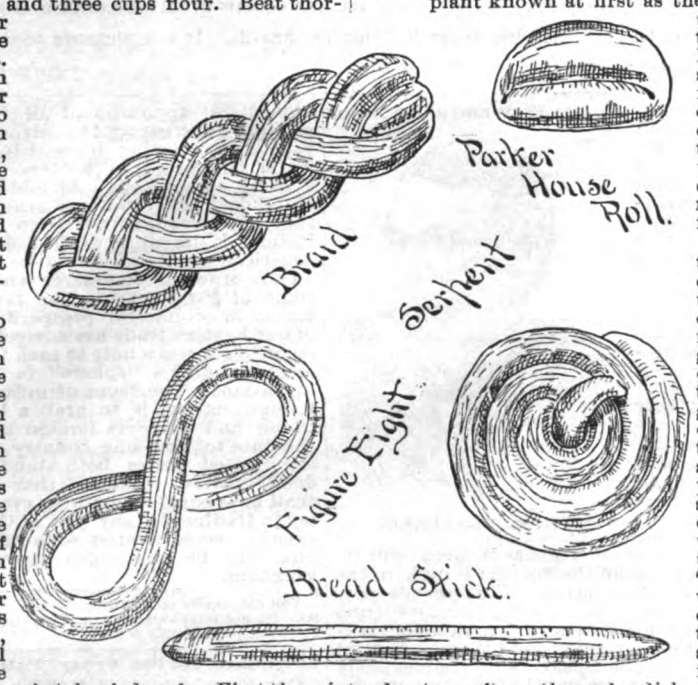
WHEAT BREAD.

Into a bowl put two cups boiling water or scalded milk and add two tablespoons sugar, one teaspoon salt, and, when liquid has become luke-warm, one yeast cake dissolved in one-half cup warm water. Mix in enough flour to make a stiff dough—about seven cups. Knead until the dough is elastic, cover and set to rise. When the dough has doubled its bulk knead slightly while still in the bowl. When again double in bulk, make into two loaves and set to rise in buttered pans; when it has risen the third time bake one hour.

If a brown, glossy crust is desired, brush over the top of each loaf, a short time before removing from the oven, a little sugar dissolved in milk, or the beaten yolk of an egg diluted with a little milk.

For a change once in a while have

ENTIRE WHEAT BREAD.



Put one tablespoon shortening, two tablespoons molasses and one and a half teaspoons salt into a mixing bowl; pour on one cup boiling water and one cup scalded milk; when luke-warm add one yeast cake dissolved in one-fourth cup warm water; then add flour, using one cup white flour and enough entire wheat to knead. After kneading put in a bowl, cover and set to rise. Shape in loaves, again let rise and bake in a hot oven about fifty minutes.

We give illustrations of various fancy rolls, which are made from what we call the

"DINNER ROLL MIXTURE."

Put one-fourth cup butter, two tablespoons sugar and one teaspoon salt in a bowl and pour on two cups scalded milk; when luke-warm add one yeast cake dissolved in one-fourth cup warm water, and three cups flour. Beat thoroughly, cover and let rise until light. Cut down and add flour enough to knead. Then let rise again, shape, place on buttered sheets, again let rise and bake in a hot oven about fifteen minutes.

If one is to give a course luncheon there may be two or more courses with which bread in some form should be served. It is a little more attractive and dainty if served in different shapes for the various courses, though all may be made from the same batch of dough. First there is the bread stick, which, when baked, is about six inches long and the size of one's finger. Then the Parker House and oyster roll, which should be made very small. The figure eight is simply a long, twisted piece, and the serpent is a long coiled piece, one end brought up through the middle to form the head. The braid is made by taking three long pieces and fastening them together and then braiding. It is easier to make a long braid and then cut it into smaller ones, say three inches in length.

PULLED BREAD.

Remove crusts from a fresh loaf of French bread—gash the loaf at the ends and pull apart into halves; cut the halves and pull apart into quarters, repeating the process until the pieces are the size of bread sticks. Put in a pan in oven to dry and then brown delicately. These may be kept in an air tight tin box for sometime, and just before serving should be put into the oven to make them crisp.

Right here let me speak of the heavy crash which is now being extensively used for kneading bread, instead of the usual moulding board. It is considered much more healthful as it can be kept perfectly clean and so free from germs. It is simply a large piece of heavy crash, which has been washed and ironed and is spread directly upon the table; the flour is then sprinkled over it and the bread kneaded exactly as when the board is used.

For the soup course, serve the bread sticks, or Imperial Sticks, which are shown in our initial. These are made from stale bread, as follows:

IMPERIAL STICKS.

Cut stale bread into thin slices, remove the crusts and spread with butter and cut into one-third inch strips. Lay on a baking sheet and bake until of a delicate brown. Cut also some rings, from the thin buttered slices of bread, and bake in the same way. Serve the rings with the sticks put through them, one or two rings with three or four of the sticks, to each person, either upon a small plate, or on a folded napkin.

Possibly a few other suggestions for using up stale bread may be acceptable.

TOMATO CREAM SOUP.

Scald one quart of milk with half an onion, into which stick four cloves; add a small piece of bay leaf, a little parsley and three-fourths cup of stale bread crumbs. Remove the seasoning and rub bread through a fine sieve. Cook two cups tomatoes with two teaspoons sugar for fifteen minutes, add one-fourth teaspoon soda, rub through sieve, and add to the bread and milk. Add five tablespoons butter in small pieces and season with salt and pepper.

The crumbs should first be taken from the inside of the loaf; then the soft sides of the crusts should be grated off by the use of a large grater. The crusts themselves should not be used. After the bread has been grated and rubbed as fine as possible, it should be put through a sieve, so that all the crumbs may be of a uniform size; it is then so fine that it thickens much the same as flour does, and yet gives a pleasanter flavor to the soup.

EGGS ON TOAST.

Cut thin slices of stale bread, and from each slice cut a circular piece as large as possible without including the crusts. Saute in butter and place on a hot platter. Pour over the slices a white sauce, and arrange on each piece some chopped ham, the whites of eggs finely chopped and the yolks forced through a ricer. Garnish with parsley.

This makes a nice breakfast or luncheon dish. As the eggs are cold, it is necessary to set the platter into the oven for five minutes before putting on the parsley.

The white sauce is made of one and one-half tablespoons flour, two tablespoons butter, one-fourth teaspoon salt and one cup milk. The butter is melted and the flour rubbed in and then the hot milk is added. This is called a thin white sauce, and if a thick one is desired, the addition of another tablespoon of flour is all that is necessary.

To "saute" is simply to fry quickly.

ORANGE PUDDING.

Soak one and one-third cups stale bread crumbs in one cup of cold water for twenty minutes; add one cup sugar, one cup orange juice, one tablespoon lemon juice, two whole eggs and the yolk of another, slightly beaten, one tablespoon melted butter and one-fourth teaspoon salt. Bake in a buttered pudding dish in a slow oven until firm. Cool slightly and cover with a frosting made from the whites of two eggs, two tablespoons powdered sugar and one-fourth teaspoon orange extract.

Please bear in mind that all our measurements are level.

THE POTATO.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

WHEN Pizarro and his companions, while seeking for gold among the mountains of Peru, saw the Indians cultivating the plant known at first as the Papas Peruanorum, they certainly did not suspect the importance of their discovery, nor the services which it was destined to render to mankind.

Admitted to the tables of the rich, under some one of the many disguises created by the inventive genius of culinary art, the potato appears in its primitive state at those of the poor, where served up in its "jacket," and with no other conditions than salt and hunger, it forms, only too often, the sole dish. But when, less than half a century ago, in that country which, more than any other, had relied on the potato as an article of food, a sudden blight destroyed in a few days the hopes of the husbandman, the wealthy, no less than the humble, felt the disaster, and the potato famine, by the bitter memories it left in the minds of the Irish people, and the impetus it gave to emigration, produced wide-spreading and untoward results, of which we do not as yet descry the termination.

The first tubers known in Europe under the name of potatoes were of a different order of plants from those which now bear that name. It was during Magellan's journey round the world (1591—1522) that Pigagetta, an Italian naturalist who accompanied him, saw in Brazil, the Batata, or sweet potato. We do not, however, know if it was thence brought to Spain, or at a later period from Peru, but it was most probably the Spaniards and the Portuguese who introduced it into their colonies in the East, and it is now cultivated in India, China, Japan, the Southern States of the Union, and in Italy. In England, the trade with Spain made it known as an article of commerce under the names of "potades" or "potatoes," a corruption of the Spanish, and it seems to have been in demand for making conserves and sweetmeats. A little later, on the invasion of Peru, the Spaniards became acquainted with a root called "papa," resembling the batata, but of a hardier nature; and from the descriptions of it given by the historians of the Conquests, it seems to be what we now know as the potato. For centuries before the arrival of the Spaniards the Peruvian Incas had paid great attention to the development of agriculture, and as the "papa" formed the principal nutriment of the inhabitants of the higher and colder regions, unsuited to the cultivation of maize or batatas, it must have been an object of special care, since the names of as many as eleven varieties are to be found in dictionaries of the Peruvian language.

Pedro de Ciesa, a companion of Pizarro and Garcilaso de la Vega, the earliest writers who describe the "papa," state that the Indians crush the tubers to expel the water, then dry them in the sun, and thus prepare a food called Chuno, which can be preserved for a considerable time.

The exact date of the introduction of the potato into England, and the name of the person to whom the English owe it, are still matters of uncertainty. It has always been maintained that, in 1565 Sir John Hawkins brought the potato from Santa Fe, in Venezuela, and that Sir Walter Raleigh brought it into Ireland from Virginia in 1568. But the chronicler of Sir John Hawkins' travels merely states that at Santa Fe Indians came to them with potatoes and pineapples for sale; the word "potato" meaning at that time only the batata, which must have been already known as an article of commerce, while the tuber we now call the potato did not receive that name till many years later.

For many years the cultivation of the tuber made but little progress in the United Kingdom. In Scotland it became known in Kirkcudbright as late as 1725, in Stirlingshire in 1728, and in Forfarshire in 1730. It was not till 1740 that a season of peculiar severity gave the first impulse to the more extensive cultivation of a root which promised to be an effectual remedy against such a visitation. It was at that time, however, raised only by spade culture, which required more exertion than the slovenly farmers of those days cared to submit to and it was generally believed that it could be preserved only by being left in the earth where it grew. The potato, therefore, was not grown on an extensive scale and it was only about 1790, when farming had come to be better understood and practiced throughout Scotland, that its value was fully recognized and that it met with the attention it deserved.

The same want of appreciation of the potato long prevailed in England. In Lancashire, where it was probably brought from Ireland, it was planted in the fields in 1634, but it is only a little more than a hundred years since its cultivation became general. When Arthur Young made his tours through England, between 1767 and 1770, he found that in very extensive tracts of the country over which he traveled, potatoes were not a common article of culture; but that in the north more farmers grew them than in the south or east. In France Turgot was the first to point out its utility, during a famine which occurred while he was Intendant of Limousin, between 1761 and 1773 and he had at first great difficulty in conquering the prejudices of the people, who only consented to make use of it after M l'Intendant had had it served up at his own table. The efforts of Antoine Parmentier in the same direction were more successful. His attention was first drawn to the cultivation of the potato by the prize offered in 1771 by the Academy of Besancon for the discovery of alimentary substance which might compensate for the deficiency of corn at a time of scarcity. He gained the prize by an essay, in which he demonstrated the nutritious qualities of the starch contained in many plants, and obtained from the Government leave to sow with potatoes fifty-four acres of a sterile tract near Versailles. At first the incredulous public laughed at the seemingly hopeless undertaking, but, when the plants grew up, Parmentier presented a bouquet of the flowers to Louis XVI. The King, who had always been favorably inclined towards Parmentier, accepted them willingly, and appeared in public wearing them in his buttonhole. The patronage of Royalty rendered the plant at once fashionable; the prejudices existing against it disappeared and the government was enabled to spread its culture throughout the Provinces.

Toward the close of the eighteenth century it was extensively cultivated throughout Germany, but it was only after the wars of Napoleon that it began to be used for the production of the potato-spirit, which now forms such an important branch of German commerce.

The potato disease was first observed in 1764 and during sixty or seventy years it ravaged districts situated in widely separated countries.

A STRINGENT FOOD LAW.

The law enacted by the Missouri legislature, which prohibits the manufacture or sale of any article intended for food or to be used in the preparation of food, which contains alum, arsenic, ammonia, etc., places that state in the advance in the matter of sanitary legislation.

Laws restricting the use of alum in bread have been in force in England, Germany and France for many years. In this country, in Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, Kentucky and several other states, direct legislation in reference to the sale of alum baking powders has also been effected. In several of these states their sale is prohibited unless they are branded to show that they contain alum, nd in the District of Columbia, under the laws of Congress, the sale of bread containing alum has been made illegal.

Following are the names of some of the brands of baking powder which are shown by recent analysis to contain alum. House-keepers and grocers should cut the list out and keep it for reference:

Baking Powders Containing Alum:

DAVIS' O. K., DRY YEAST, ... Contain Alum.
R. B. Davis & Co., New York.
CALUMET . . . . . Contains Alum.
Calumet Baking Powder Co., Chicago.
GRAND UNION . . . . . Contains Alum.
Grand Union Tea Co., New York.
BON BON, HOTEL, ... Contain Alum.
Grant Chemical Co., Chicago.
GOOD LUCK . . . . . Contains Alum.
Southern Mfg. Co., Richmond.
EGG . . . . . Contains Alum.
Egg Baking Powder Co., New York.
A. & P. . . . . Contains Alum.
Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., New York.
K. C. I. C. . . . . Contain Alum.
Jaques Mfg. Co., Chicago.
CROWN . . . . . Contains Alum.
J. P. Dieter Co., Chicago.
KENTON. . . . . Contains Alum.
Potter-Parlin Co., Cincinnati.
DELICATESSE . . . . . Contains Alum.
Delicatesse Baking Powder Co., New York.

In addition to these, many grocers sell what they call their own private or special brands. These powders are put up for the grocer, and his name put upon the labels by manufacturers of alum powders. The manufacturers, it is said, find their efforts to market their goods in this way greatly aided by the ambition of the grocer to sell a powder with his own name upon the label, especially as he can make an abnormal profit upon it. Many grocers, doubtless, do not know that the powders they are thus pushing are alum powders, the sale of which would be a misdemeanor under the law referred to.

It is quite impossible to give the names of all the alum baking powders. They are constantly appearing in all sorts of disguises, under different names and at all kinds of prices, even as low as five and ten cents a pound. They can be avoided, however, by the housekeeper who will bear in mind that all baking powders sold at twenty-five cents or less per pound are liable to contain alum, as pure cream of tartar powders cannot be produced at anything like this price.

TAKE care of the old newspapers, for they are useful in many things. They will polish window-glasses and they will clean lamp chimneys, they will test and clean flatirons, they make excellent covers for pantry shelves, they protect the kitchen table from hot and soiled pie plates, they cover clean clothes on the drying horse to protect them from flies and dust. They are a great moth preventive, too, and articles packed away for the summer in closely sealed bags of newspaper, are sure to be safe if they were properly aired and brushed before being packed. Bags made of old newspapers are excellent, too, for keeping herbs and seeds.

DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS:

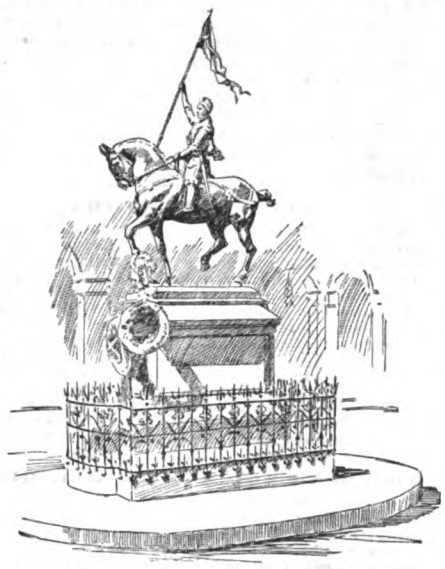
Happy New Year to you all, dear friends. Here is 1900 with us at last. How bright and hopeful it spreads out before us! How much it promises in the way of peace, prosperity and happiness! We have no war on our hands, if we except that in the Philippines; business is active everywhere, and for pleasure there is the Paris exposition. What more can we ask?—except that we use our blessings rightly and make the most we can of them both for ourselves and for others.

Our first letter this month takes us away from the howling storms of the north into the sunny state of Louisiana, and shows us the old city of New Orleans in her many aspects.

"Aunt Minerva suggests that some one who has 'been and done' it should furnish a brief sketch of New Orleans and the old French Market. But what pen can paint an adequate picture of that queer, sunny old town, with her antique buildings, lovely parks, canals of black waters, statues, banks of roses, laden orange trees, stately palaces and filthy hovels, flocks of goats, geese, cattle, and horses grazing on the lush swamps sandwiched between suburban homes, her wharves with ships of all nations, steamers, large and small, craft of all kinds. The customs and costumes of half the nations of the earth mix and mingle on her streets. There goes a Mexican with jeweled sombrero, pausing to sample the wares of a small, brown lad who cries with shrill voice: 'Hot Tomales! Chili-con-noni!' And there, down the middle of the street, passes a sailor's funeral party—sailors in full dress uniform forming a hollow square made by grasping a rope, within which is carried the corpse—the whole preceded by a band, whose music is indeed 'grand, gloomy and peculiar' to an American ear.

THE OLD FRENCH MARKET, NEW ORLEANS.

"The city, built on a thin crust over the swampy, crescent-shaped peninsula, is lower than the river, and a visitor goes to bed with a creepy, uncomfortable fear that the mighty yellow flood of the formidable Mississippi will burst its bounds and engulf the whole city. But the natives laugh at such a suggestion, and only pause for a moment to exclaim with astonishment when a big slice of earth crumbles away from the insidious inroads of the dangerous waters. The cemeteries are deservedly famous as being the most unique in America, the dead being 'buried' above ground. The slime-covered gutters, the pools reeking with decaying vegetation seem to offer an open invitation to yellow fever and cholera.



"We explored the French Market, where everything under the sun is offered for sale in every patois imaginable, including the Choctaw, in which a withered squaw with a bright-eyed pappoose tied to her back, hawked her beaded things and eagle feathers. We went for a Sunday 'fish-breakfast' at a French restaurant in the rambling old market. We explored the old French quarter, once the haunt of the 'haut ton' but now quaint and ancient enough. We were shown the house where Lafitte, the pirate, lived, loved, was married and died the conventional 'death in bed', so little to be expected of a daredevil like he was. The old Cathedral of St. Louis, full of wonders and storied interest—the shrines, the cemeteries, Custom-house, Mint, etc., claim one's attention, and the sight-seeing is incomplete till one visits the jetties, the Gulf, Chalmette, and the two most noted pleasure resorts—West End and Spanish Fort, where one's first exclamation is: 'Arcadia! pure and simple!' But the exquisite flowers, the fountains filled with gold and scarlet fish, the maze or labyrinth composed of jessamine hedge, the moss-draped live-oaks, the ponds of huge alligators, swings for children, all out-door appliances for innocent pleasure, disguise but fail to conceal the real nature of the place. Gambling in every form, billiards, cards, games of all sorts go on all day Sunday. New Orleans is said by those capable of judging to be more like old-world cities than any other in America."

ROSE LANE BROWN, Athens, Tennessee.

As a general thing we like to confine our letters to those dealing with our own country, its wonders, its inventions and its industries; but this year when so many are going abroad, it will be well for us to wander a little also and we will begin by taking a peep at the old town of Rouen, France, and the monument there erected to Joan of Arc.

"While on my way from Paris to the seaport Dieppe to cross the English Channel we stopped off for a day in Rouen, one of the oldest and most historic of the cities of France. It existed in the days of Julius Cæsar and later on was the capital of Normandy and the home of William the Conqueror.

"But the city of Rouen is especially interesting to the traveler for its connection with the life of MONUMENT OF JOAN OF ARC, ROUEN, FRANCE.

Joan of Arc. It was here that the poor, unfortunate Maid of Orleans was brought after having been captured by the English, and where she was finally burned at the stake. The city of Rouen was at that time (1431) a British possession. There is now to be seen the remains of a tower of an old castle in which Joan was imprisoned, tried and put to the rack. The tower is called after her name. In the square near by is a statue of this remarkable heroine erected on the very spot, it is said, where she met her tragic death.

"Not far from here can be seen an ancient bell tower (Grosse Horloge), built in 1389. In this tower, in olden time, hung the curfew bell which was rung for fifteen minutes every evening to remind the inhabitants that it was time to turn in, and woe to him who did not heed its warning. He was either thrashed by the watch or robbed by the thieves. One of the most beautiful Gothic cathedrals in all Europe is at Rouen. It was built in the thirteenth century, and has twenty-five chapels and numerous monuments. Henry the Second is buried here, also the heart of Richard Couer de Lion. One of the towers of the cathedral, called the 'Butter tower' (Tour de Buerre), takes its name from the fact that it was erected by means of the money paid by people for permission to eat butter during Lent. The church of Saint Ouen, not far from the cathedral, is another magnificent specimen of Gothic architecture.

"Many of the streets of Rouen are well and regularly built with fine modern stone houses adorning them. But much of the city consists of old, picturesque streets and squares, with tall, quaintly carved, wooden-bound and gabled houses. Some of the streets are very narrow, so narrow that you can stand in the middle of them and reaching out touch houses on either side. As we wandered about here looking at the ancient houses, we could easily believe ourselves transported back a few hundred years. But we were suddenly made to realize that we were living in the every-day nineteenth century, for right above our heads, decorating one of the oldest of the buildings, we spied in plain English the advertisement of Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup! We left Rouen feeling that no matter how far we might travel in foreign parts we could never get away from enterprising America."

ELIZABETH WOOD, Batavia, N. Y.

Let people say what they will of the beauties and wonders of foreign lands, yet I cannot help feeling that our own country is the best and the most beautiful of them all, and so let us come back to it and visit one of its historic bits of scenery as described in the next letter.

"One of the most romantic and historic spots in Illinois is Starved Rock, around which many events of interest have taken place since first visited by white men. In September, 1673, Marquette, Joliet, five oarsmen and two Indian interpreters sailed up the Illinois river, being the first time a white man had ever seen the waters of the 'Lone and sluggish Illinois'.

"The first use made of the Rock was by La Salle, who, with Tonti, came to this section in 1679, and resolved to build a fort on 'Le Rocher' as he named it. He and Tonti spent some time at the 'great town' of the Illini Indians situated about one mile west of the Rock on the north bank of the river.

"The French, at that time, intended to build a chain of forts from Canada to Louisiana and found a mighty empire in the Mississippi valley and La Salle intended the fort at 'Le Rocher,' to be one of the principal forts in the chain. In December, 1682, the French soldiers dragged the logs up the steep sides of 'Le Rocher' and constructed Fort St. Louis on its summit. Shortly after La Salle returned to France and never returned to this region, as he was assassinated while on an expedition in Texas. Tonti remained in command, but the forces and defenses melted away and in 1700 all that remained was a few stakes of the stockade.

"About the year 1770 occurred the melancholy event which gave to the cliff its present name. During a council of war, Pontiac, an Ottawa chief, but holding great power over the Pottawatomies, was killed by an Illini brave. The Pottawatomies determined to destroy the Illini, who fled to the cliff now called 'Starved Rock,' and the Pottawatomies camped below to starve them out, and, after weary days of watching, succeeded; the ill-fated Indians plunging headlong down among the enemy, one after another, singing the death song. A small remnant which tried to escape was massacred without mercy.

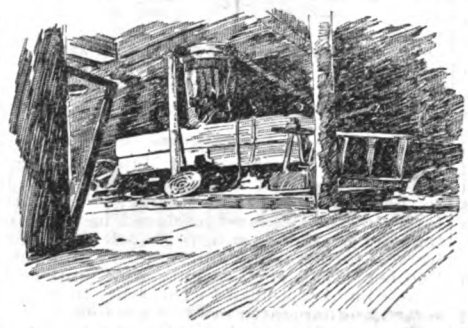
"'Starved Rock' is on the south bank of the Illinois river in La Salle county, and upon the river front it rises one hundred and fifty-seven feet above the river. It is nearly circular in form with a level top containing half an acre. A deep gorge on the east, a valley on the south and west isolates it from neighboring bluffs, and its summit can only be reached by climbing up a seriesof ledges on the south side. Geologists assert that the valley of the Illinois was once the bed of a mighty prehistoric flood which has left its action on the soft sandstone in this valley, and that 'Starved Rock' is a monument of that grinding and buffeting flood."

A. W. TAYLOR, Mt. Sterling, Ill.

Our next letter, on the Catlin Coal Mines, is, I suspect, written by one of my juvenile nephews; but, as his letter is well written it shall have a place among the rest. He says:

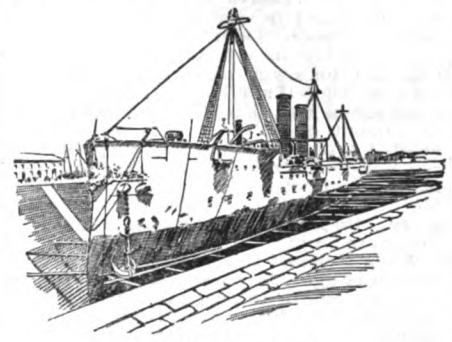


"Over the hole through which the coal is hoisted out there is a kind of scaffold which the cage runs up and down. On the north side there is a pair of scales and the coal is dumped into this by means of a self-dumping cage. By the side of the scales stands a man who takes down the weight of the cars of coal and then dumps them into the shaker screen which separates the slack from the nut coal. Both slack and nut coal are dumped into flat cars and hauled away. On the south side is a large brick building inside of which is the engine which hoists the coal. Now we will go into the mine. The cager gives the engineer three bells and the cage is lowered to the ground landing. As it sinks with you you feel as if you were falling. Now we are at the bottom, and you may take your choice as to whether you will walk or ride. Suppose we ride. We enter the car, the driver cracks his whip and off start the mules down the path. Here we are at the working part of the mines. Men are busy getting out the coal by means of picks or loading it on cars like that in which we rode."

OSCAR PATI, Vandercook, Ill.

Now we have a "tale of the Spanish war," which war has not yet, I take it, lost its interest for my readers.

"Among the many relics of our late war there are none which attracts so much attention or which so impress one with the destructiveness of modern warfare as the ex-Spanish cruiser, Reina Mercedes. This ship arrived at Old Point Comfort on the ninth of May, and after remaining there in quarantine for a week was brought directly to the navy yard at Portsmouth, Virginia.



"The cruiser is now in the dry dock undergoing temporary repairs; after which she will be sent to Portsmouth, N. H., where she will probably be used as a receiving ship. Her hull is staunch, but her decks and machinery are so badly wrecked from shells and rust that to put her in fighting trim would cost more money than our Government feels justified in expending. At first sight of the ship one is surprised at her old and battle-scarred appearance. Her hull is pierced in many places with great, jagged rents, which have been patched with iron plates, and altogether one might imagine her to be a relic of the Civil war or a veteran of many naval fights.

"On going aboard one gains a better idea of the damage sustained. The starboard side of the bridge was struck and wrecked by a shell which also killed ten men on the gun deck below. On this deck the funnels and ventilators are pierced in many places; the large smokestack has a hole nearly a yard square, besides numberless smaller ones; and on every side are marks of shot and shell. The berth deck sustained the worst handling, and it is here that the force and accuracy of our guns is best indicated. A twelve inch shell came through the thick plates near aft, cutting through them as if they were nothing more than paper, then ploughing its way through six or eight iron beams an inch or more in thickness, and curving slightly downward exploded in the dynamo, leaving it a mass of wreckage. Another shell came through in this vicinity, cutting the large mast in two and continuing through the opposite side leaving a rent large enough to admit a man's body. A large piece of one of these shells has since been found weighing fifty pounds. The floor of this deck is torn up for a considerable distance and everything presents the appearance of having been the target for a withering and well directed fire."

ASHBY WATKINS, Portsmouth, Va.

Now we will take a little trip to stern New England, but we will forget that she is at the present moment locked in ice and snow, and will try to view her in her summer aspects, as we read the following letter.

"Old Orchard Beach is one of the principal seaside resorts of the country, situated on the shores of the eastern part of Maine, and Casco Bay. The facilities for bathing here are exceedingly good, and the beach, which has a long, hard, level margin of sand at low tide, making a delightful spot for ball games, bicycle riding, croquet, and other pastimes, is of course, the principal attraction. Not very many pretty things were to be found on these sands of the sea. I could see nothing except the ubiquitous clam shell, sand dollar, (so called) star fish, sea weed and sea moss.

"Everybody who goes to Old Orchard takes a walk on the steel pier which is well worth inspection. It is said to be over two thousand feet long, and one hundred and twenty-five feet wide, and is protected by a stout railing. At the ocean end is a pretty casino where one may buy almost anything in the way of eatables, soda and souvenirs, and be entertained with band concerts. A train of miniature cars runs the length of this pier. This train is not so small, however, but that it will accommodate thirty two adults. Each car is an open seat, and will serve but one person. The train is drawn by a cunning little engine which boasts of a startling little whistle and a musical little bell.

"The steam cars take one from Old Orchard to the large city of Portland, twelve miles away, and to its fascinating harbor attractions, and both steam cars and electrics run to the interesting towns of Saco and Biddeford. Saco river is separated from the ocean by an enormous stone breakwater, against which the breakers dash defiantly. Biddeford Pool, situated near, is only saved from being romantic by its abundant supply of lobsters. The pool itself is a bit treacherous and fascinating.

"I cannot close this article without reference to the unique little peanutena team, which in summer was seen daily at Old Orchard. The body of this conveyance, which was highly polished, resembled a peanut, placed horizontally on wheels, and had a compartment in the back, containing a confection called peanutena, which was offered for sale. Above this body was a high seat, on which sat a pretty little girl, about seven years of age, fancifully dressed, and skillfully driving tandem two little donkeys wearing fine apparel and tinkling bells."

G. H. LOWELL, Newport, N. H.

Our cousin, Beular Keller, sends us a description of her home which makes me wish it were summer, so that I might travel there and get a drink from the cool "poplar spring." She says:

"About fifty or sixty years ago when this land was all in woods there were very few people settled in the country around. The main road ran through here and close to the road stood two large poplar trees between which was a strong spring of the best water in the country. This being before the railroad was built through here large droves of cattle were often driven through from one place to another. They always made this one of their watering stations. The man who then owned the land, cleared a portion which was close to the road, and built there, over the spring, a large log house, three stories in height. Here he kept a tavern and post office and also a small grocery. The place was called Poplar Spring, by which name it is still known.

"Then a wealthy man bought the farm, tore down the old house and built upon its site a large brick house which contains, besides its many rooms above ground, four cellars. One of these, containing the spring, is called the dairy cellar, and is six feet deep. There are two other springs in the cellars and two long trenches. These are all dug from the solid rock, and all the cellars have cemented floors. The water is very cool and refreshing, and in the dryest weather is of great abundance. One of the cellars is very dark, there being but one door. This cellar is used for keeping fruit in the winter, as it is impossible for fruit to freeze in the dark cellar.

"There are two outside buildings, also of brick, one being the smoke house and the other a store house for wood and coal. All are surrounded by brick pavements."

BEULAR KELLER, Cameron, West Va.

And now my space is full and I must reluctantly adjourn the meeting and bid my nieces and nephews good-by for a season.

The Case of Bobby Goslington.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

WHEN a soft-toothed man goes into metropolitan newspaperdom with a firm determination to remain, a shudder goes through the body journalistic, and a strong wind arises from the shaking of old heads. It was so when Bobby Goslington went on the city staff of the Morning Wail, and I suppose it will ever be so while newspapers are what they are and new reporters dance fearlessly upon ground sown thick with mines.

Bobby Goslington was very soft and blind. The atmosphere surrounding the Wail appeared red to him, whereas really it was the sickliest of yellow; and he labored under the delusion that the paper was a powerful factor in the uplifting of mankind, while in reality it was only uplifting itself, and bringing blood or honor at every lift. He did not know this—did not wish to know it. It was not for him to suspect the motives of the great. His own heart was as clean as his upper lip. Guilelessness sported in his bosom. An excellent opinion of himself—justified perhaps—occupied the best room in his head, and complacently refused to move at the behest of other equally excellent and more important opinions. He was of the Wail, hence the Wail was good. It is a common enough method of reasoning. I have no fault to find with it.

Bobby Goslington was a native of Bunkersville. Nobody knows where Bunkersville is. It is somewhere upon the same map with New York, and it has to be satisfied with that, and hold its peace. When Bobby left Bunkersville his he.. had been wrenched a good deal. It pained him somewhat to feel that the parents who had brought him in and up were to lose the best thing they had ever done. Then there was a girl whom he had loved distractedly when he was not feeling very well, and upon whom he had expended a vast quantity of dignified affection at other times. She was a nice little thing, and she considered him to be solid gold, which he was not, any more than the rest of us. We are all plated, and some of us cannot show white metal where the rubs have come.

Bobby had been two years upon the Wail staff before he returned to Bunkersville. He had been granted a vacation reluctantly, which was a great compliment. The old heads had ceased to shake as he passed through the doorway. They considered the danger to be largely over now, and they drew long breaths laden with beer, and expressed hope for his future. And while they did so Bobby was rushing pell-mell into enough trouble to make up for everything.

At a certain station on the railroad which by some inexplicable chance led to Bunkersville, a tall, distinguished-looking man got aboard the train and set himself beside Bobby Goslington. More, he engaged Bobby Goslington in conversation, and so won upon his good graces that the soft young man was not surprised to learn, although the information dropped out quite accidentally, that the gentleman was none other than a prominent candidate for the United States Senate—a man whose name was set in big, black letters at the heads of news-columns—a man whose every utterance was considered worthy of publication.

Bobby Goslington trembled as the hunter trembles when suddenly confronted by the lion. Hesitatingly he turned the conversation into political channels. He could scarcely credit his senses. The great man talked—talked on general politics and, finally, stated his opinion relative to the Blugwug Bill, upon which the smoothest interviewers had failed to bring him to commit himself. It was the crucial point, that Blugwug Bill; it was the all-important issue of a mighty contest. He got off the train shortly after stating his views upon the Blugwug Bill and Bobby hugged himself for twenty miles. Then he looked at his watch. It was five o'clock. Bunkersville was four hours distant. He resolved to disembark at the next station, go to a hotel and write his story. Bunkersville could wait; the story was too good to keep.

Thus it came about that shortly after seven of that evening the telegraph editor of the Wail was rushing frantically to the Old Man with Bobby's story, and the Old Man was looking it over with shining eyes and Goslington stock was thundering at the top. The Wail came out the next morning with headlines bigger than it had used since the taking of Santiago. It was glorious.

Then the scene changed—abruptly. The Old Man was running his hands through his hair while a number of wildly irate politicians, among them the candidate for Senator, who had returned to town that morning, danced about him, spouting red-hot words.

"O Lord!" exclaimed the candidate for Senator. "O Lord! You've gone and plumped the whole plumpetty-plump thing into the plumpetty-plump fire—plumpetty-plump it!"

This was sad news to the Old Man, and he showed it. "Did—didn't you say it?" he asked meekly.

"No, sir; I said nothing! Think I'm a donketty-donk donkey? Your young man interviewed some other fellow—some viletty-vile enemy of mine! You've got to retract!"

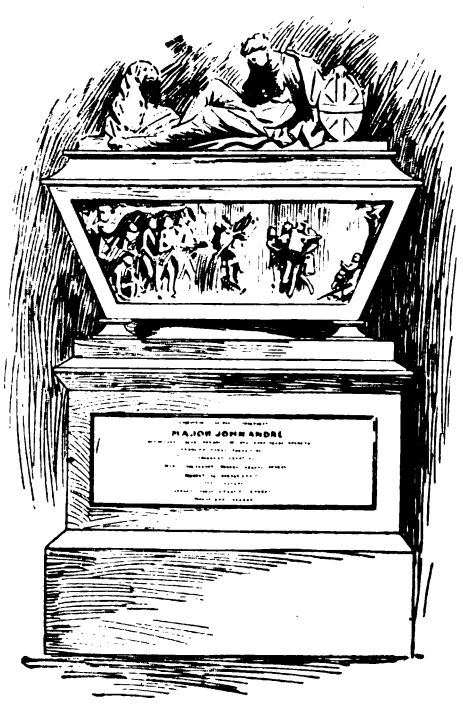
"Well, I guess not!" The neck of the Old Man straightened. "No, no; I don't think! You've stated an opinion on the Blugwug Bill, now you've got to stick by it."

"Stick by it!" The candidate for Senator was thunderstruck. "Me—an opinion—stick by it—O Lord!"

"I know it's ridiculous," said the Old Man softly, "but the Wail can't go back on a column of stuff like that. Come; we'll support you and you can drag the Bill off somewhere after a while and kill it if you don't like it."

"I had much rather kill that youngetty-young man of yours!" said the candidate giving in.

"I'll attend to his case," said the Old Man grimly.



* * * * * *

In Bunkersville that day Bobby Goslington went forth to call upon the girl. His chin was high in the air and the prospects were not flattering for a pleasant reunion of two loving hearts. Bobby was conscious of having made the "beat" of the year, and the consciousness was crowding the reunion fireworks into a small corner and crushing them dreadfully. As he was entering the familiar front gate a boy handed him an envelope. At the same instant the door opened and the girl came fluttering and blushing down the path to meet him.

"O Bobby," she cried, "are you home to stay?"

"N-no"—Bobby was opening the envelope—"y-y-yes—I—believe—I—am!"

The telegram floated to the ground and he kissed the girl tenderly, with a new born meekness showing in his eyes.

ANDRE'S MONUMENT.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

"Sacred to the memory of Major Andre, who, raised by his merit at an early period of life, to the rank of Adjutant-General of the British forces in America, and employed in an important but hazardous enterprise, fell a sacrifice to his zeal for his King and country, on the 2d October, 1780, aged twenty-nine, universally beloved and esteemed by the army in which he served, and lamented even by his foes."

These are the words which begin the very long inscription on the monument to Major Andre in Westminster Abbey.

To me this was one of the most interesting memorials in the whole Abbey, and I was never tired of coming back to look at it again. The monument stands against the wall of the south side of the nave. It is a large panel representing a funeral casket upon a high pedestal. The inscription is carved upon the pedestal. On the casket is a bas-relief representing the presentation of Major Andre's letter to General Washington on the night before his execution. The figures in the bas-relief are about a foot high. The ease with which their heads can be broken off has been too great a temptation to relic hunters, and most of the heads have been knocked off and stolen.

The verger who showed me about the Abbey told me that the Deans at various times had had new heads fastened on, only to lose them again. When I was there one or two were gone. That such vandalism is not wholly modern is shown from the fact that Charles Lamb writes of the defacing of this very monument in this way in his "Essays of Elia." Southey, the poet, when a boy, was a pupil at the Westminster School. Later in life he was exceedingly sensitive in regard to his political principles, and for a time a serious quarrel existed between himself and Lamb, because the latter, speaking in regard to this injury to Andre's monument, described it as "the wanton mischief of some schoolboy, fired perhaps with raw notions of transatlantic freedom." Then, addressing Southey, he added, "The mischief was done about the time that you were a scholar there. Do you know anything about the unfortunate relic?"

When I visited the Abbey first, now some five years ago, there was fastened upon the wall, just above the monument, a wreath of oak leaves which the late Dean Stanley had brought from Tarrytown-on-the-Hudson, on the occasion of his last visit to America. They had been gathered in the autumn, and still showed enough of color to be in keeping with the tragedy which the monument commemorated. It was characteristic of Dean Stanley that he should have them fastened against the wall with a rusty bayonet which he also brought from the historic Hudson river battlefield. He loved Westminster Abbey. His whole life was bound up in the grand old building, but he was an eminently practical man. He liked to see crowds of visitors throng the Abbey, and he spared no thought nor effort to add to its interest. People who did not like him, or were jealous of him did not hesitate to comment on this, sometimes very emphatically. It is said that at the time Charles Dickens died, Dean Stanley hearing of his death late at night, telegraphed some member of Dickens' family in the night offering Westminster Abbey as a place of burial. In consequence of this some one was unkind enough to publicly call the Dean of Westminster Abbey a "body snatcher."

Andre was buried beneath the gallows, on the banks of the Hudson, in 1780. In 1820, after he had been dead forty years, and peace and friendliness had replaced the spirit of strife between England and the United States, the Duke of York, acting for a considerable number of interested people in England, sent a formal request to our Congress that he be allowed to remove Andre's body to England to be buried in Westminster Abbey. Congress granted the request; the Duke had the bones dug up and removed to where they now lie.

One of the most unique relics in the whole Abbey is the box in which these bones were brought over from America. This box is preserved in St. Islip's Chantry, a queer little "upper chamber" near the north ambulatory and reached by a ponderous but narrow winding stair of stone. Here are kept the famous wax effigies which always seemed to me a sort of "Mrs. Jarley's Wax Works" annex, totally out of keeping with the stately grandeur of this incomparable structure. The box, which is always pointed out to Americans by the vergers here, along with the rest of the uncanny old lumber, is as big as an ordinary large dry goods packing case and does not look unlike one. It would easily hold the bones of twenty-five men instead of one, after they had been buried forty years. When I commented on this the verger took off the cover of the case and showed me another small box fastened into one corner of the large one. He explained that back in 1820, when there were no great freight steamers racing across the Atlantic, and sailing vessels must be used, sailors were so superstitious that they would not knowingly carry a corpse on board. So the bones of the long-dead English soldier were put in the little box, the little box was packed in the big one, and the latter shipped as an innocent piece of freight. I do not say all this is true. I only say the two boxes are there, and that I saw them.

The Fear of Humbug

Prevents Many People From Trying a Good Medicine.

Stomach troubles are so common and in most cases so obstinate to cure that people are apt to look with suspicion on any remedy claiming to be a radical, permanent cure for dyspepsia and indigestion. Many such pride themselves on their acuteness in never being humbugged, especially in medicines.

This fear of being humbugged can be carried too far, so far, in fact, that many people suffer for years with weak digestion rather than risk a little time and money in faithfully testing the claims made of a preparation so reliable and universally used as Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

Now Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are vastly different in one important respect from ordinary proprietary medicines for the reason that they are not a secret patent medicine, no secret is made of their ingredients, but analysis shows them to contain the natural digestive ferments, pure aseptic pepsin, the digestive acids, Golden Seal, bismuth, hydrastis and nux. They are not cathartic, neither do they act powerfully on any organ, but they cure indigestion on the common sense plan of digesting the food eaten thoroughly before it has time to ferment, sour and cause the mischief. This is the only secret of their success.

Cathartic pills never have and never can cure indigestion and stomach troubles because they act entirely on the bowels, whereas the whole trouble is really in the stomach.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets taken after meals digest the food. That is all there is to it. Food not digested or half digested is poison as it creates gas, acidity, headaches, palpitation of the heart, loss of flesh and appetite and many other troubles which are often called by some other name.

They are sold by druggists everywhere at 50 cents per package. Address F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich., for little book on stomach diseases, sent free.

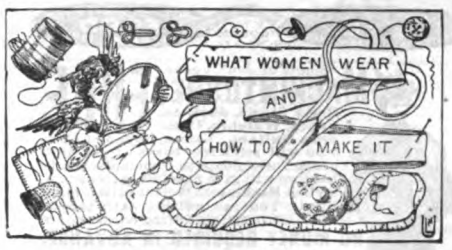
CONFECTION, FOOD, MEDICINE.

[TRADE MARK.]

Two Thousand Packages Shelled Peanuts SENT FREE.



SELL 12 PACKAGES AND GET A WATCH.

The art of shelling and salting peanuts has just reached perfection. As a confection they are peerless, as a food unequaled. German scientists have spent years experimenting with Peanut flour. It is found to contain three times the nutriment of wheat; and whole salted peanuts, being so much more palatable than wheat, have also been found with a slight addition of Pepsin Salt to be a sure cure for Dyspepsia and other stomach, kidney and liver troubles. Yes, even persons with Bright's Disease or Diabetes can now be cured. It is only neccesary for old or young to eat a few of our Pepsin Salted Peanuts after meals to keep in perfect health—but they can also be eaten in any quantity as a confection without the least distress or trouble to the weakest stomach. Children delight to feast on them and they are much better than candy. They also cure Heart Burn and Insomnia.

To Form Part of the Treat or Refreshments at party gatherings, sociables, etc., they are indispensable, and to have them on the table as dessert is the best of form. Everyone, both old and young, now wants a few in the pocket at all times to nibble on—for with all the troublesome oils properly treated as they are in our special process of Curing and Roasting Peanuts, they have at last lost all terrors to weak stomachs, and are warranted not to become rancid, and to keep well in any climate.

FREE We will send two thousand packages of these Pepsin Salted Peanuts out to responsible parties who furnish proper references. You sell 12 ten-cent packages and get a watch, a guaranteed good timekeeper. But to first introduce them quickly we send one package as a sample free to any one enclosing six cents for a three months' subscription to COMFORT. You can then test them and see how many packages you want to start with. No attention paid to first orders without trial 6c subscription. Write at once and be among the first to get the free packages. FREE

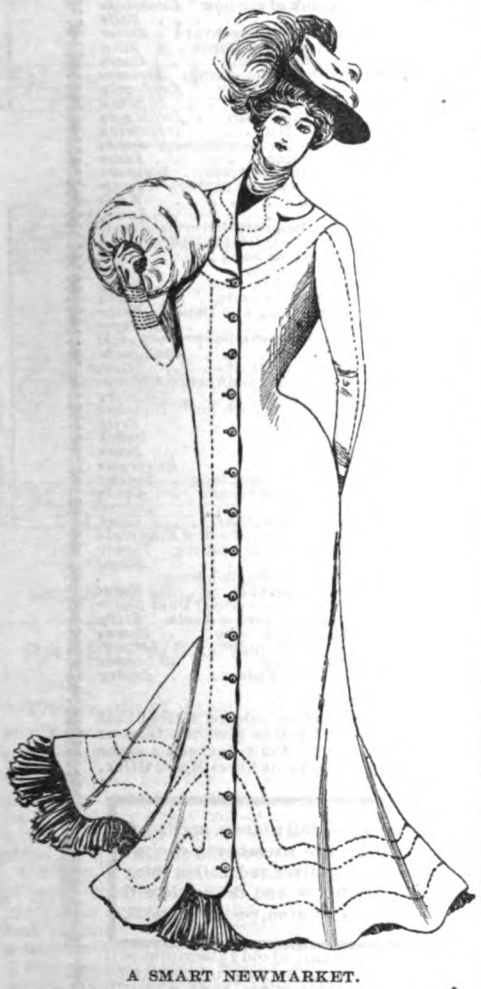
WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.



If it were not for the ingenious brains of a few clever designers I wonder what Dame Fashion would do? Probably be reduced to following one mode as in the days of our great-grandmothers and really it would be a blessing to three-fourths of womankind. The most startling new thing in the realm of dress is the eel skirt. So-called because of its fish-like shape, following as it does every line of the form as closely as possible, to within a few inches of the feet where a decided flare is arranged, with considerable train at the center of the back. Understand, there is no vestige of a ripple or fold of fullness at either side or back, indeed it is a mystery how one walks in the skirt, and, in point of fact it has made a new gait necessary, a sort of glide quite fascinating to behold, and perfectly in harmony with the snake-like appearance of the skirt.

The first skirt of this sort I saw was worn by an actress; one whose gowns are always Parisienne and whose good taste is unquestionable. The skirt was composed entirely of white sequins overlapping each other like the scales of a fish and mounted on a white silk material as elastic as rubber; at the foot it widens perceptibly into quite a frou-frou showing underneath masses of chiffon and net set on in flounces and plaitings.

Over this was worn a redingote of black guipure lace reaching to the knees at the front and ending in the train at the back. The use of pleats in the skirt is becoming more and more usual without becoming at all common. One of the newest models has the entire skirt laid in narrow side pleats in clusters of three, all around the skirt, each pleat stitched flatly as far as the knees, where they were allowed to assume their natural fullness. In spite of all that has been said against it, this style skirt of is destined to be a feature among new ideas.

An exceedingly swell gown I have in mind is made of soft violet wool, the skirt side pleated, each pleat stitched in long points to within a quarter of a yard of the foot, where the flare begins. The bodice is round, and carries out the side-pleated effect, each pleat stitched to match the skirt and apparently fastened in place by a cluster of tiny jeweled buttons. There are tiny revers of a paler shade of violet velour, opening over a guimpe of white mousseline de soie shirred so finely as to make it a question how it was accomplished. The collar is a mixture of the velour, mousseline de soie and narrow black velvet. The sleeves are remarkably dainty, the only trimming being of course at the hand. The sleeve proper ends abruptly within four inches of the wrist, and is finished with a small, pointed cuff of velour. From under this comes a snug sleeve of the shirred white stuff with tiny frills about the hand edged with black velvet.

The shops are filled with all sorts of wonderful new things in the way of outer garments, most of which are, however, regulated to carriage wear because of their unusual elaborateness. The raglan is an especially graceful garment and has no fitting seam whatever except a graceful curve under the arm. The most expensive of these are built of fur, with huge revers, collar and cuffs, and are elaborately decorated with handsome buttons. A fur hat is the usual accessory. Not the fur hat of old, but the jauntiest thing in the world, either a large, draped toque, or a dainty poke, enhanced with trimmings of flowers, lace, or plumage just like any other hat. It goes without saying that any girl of commonplace beauty would be transformed into a queen in such a rig. Then there are raglans of cloth; beautiful shades of palest gray and biscuit in Meltons and Kerseys, some with tailor-stitched finishings (and these are the most possible for street wear), while the more elegant ones have decorations of velvet, lace, or fur as the case may be.

From the raglan to the newmarket is only a step, and this latter garment is now very much favored. In the sketch is shown a new model built of slate gray Melton, fitting easily at the back, and loosely at the front. The shawl collar is trimmed with a band of the cloth stitched as is the rest of the coat.

AN ODD EFFECT.

A cute little coat adapted to smart wear, is displayed here also. It is made of black velvet with no back seams, and is set off by the odd collar of white broadcloth (the hip pieces and cuffs matching), stitched with white silk. The rolling collar has a facing of ermine.

A word about housegowns would probably not be amiss just now. I saw such a sweet, simple thing which might be copied in any material or color without being expensive. The material was dead white mohair, very silky and fine. The narrow skirt had an attached flounce headed with a thick cord of the material. This was worn in drop-skirt fashion over a petticoat of pale violet silk which did service for several gowns made in that way. The round bodice was in Spencer fashion brought with a very slight fullness into a crushed belt of white taffeta fastened simply at the front by a small rosette. A tiny guimpe of lace showed at the throat with the stock of the same, wired to stand up properly, and bound at the top with black velvet. The army sleeves were set off by a tiny drooping cuff of lace with the velvet binding.

I might, with profit, tell you how a girl I know is fixing over an old plaid dress, the material of which was good, but the design entirely out of date. The skirt which was plain, and much fuller than is worn now, was cut over after a sheath model and cut off just below the knees, where a circular flounce of plain material of the color predominating in the plaid was put on. The old plaid waist was used as a foundation, for warmth as much as anything, and had a smart little vest of white broadcloth set on, overlapped by crossed bands of narrow black velvet ribbon, the pointed ends fastened by tiny steel ornaments. A short Eton of the plain stuff was worn over this, the sleeves small and plain and long over the hand. It had a tiny coat collar and revers and, with its rows of even stitching, had a genuine tailorfied air. With it was worn a small soft toque of velvet to match, with an edging of fur and a quill at the side.

A BLACK VELVET COAT.

Such a smart ball frock as has just been finished, and before it was packed away in its swathings of tissue paper, I was allowed a peep at its daintiness. All white, a dead white, too, unrelieved by so much as a touch of color. The foundation was dead white satin. The skirt very sheath-like and clinging, with decided frou-frou at the feet; over this a soft fall of creamy white chiffon, accordion plaited; and over all this the outside skirt of white Brussels net laid in fine perpendicular tucks, an enormous amount of stuff employed in its makeup. On the satin underskirt was set flounce after flounce of pleated net and chiffon, so that at every step of the wearer billows of frothy white could be seen. The tiny bodice was of the tucked net over thin stuffs like the skirt and was cut from shoulder to shoulder, with a flat decoration of beautiful lace on its edge, the pattern brought out in heavy white cord. Over the shoulders are twisted ribbons of white velvet while this same velvet is made into rose-like rosettes in a festoon beginning at the left shoulder, crossing the bust to the waist where a twist of velvet finishes it. It is all very simple but is very deceptive as to its real cost. It could be successfully copied in black, with the velvet trimmings of any color desired.

A DUCK ROAST.

MRS. Lancaster wanted a "Duck Roast" and so she told her butcher one morning. He affably agreed to furnish it by three o'clock, but all the time he was making the promise he kept thinking, "What in the name of time is a 'Duck Roast?'"

He had no idea, but he went to all the down town meat markets; to all the restaurants; and to all the hotels, but in vain. No one had even heard of a "Duck Roast." "Well," quoth Butcher May, "Mrs. Lancaster has heard of one, and she is one of my best customers and she must have it."

He sat down and thought and thought and thought again and to some purpose too, for springing up, he cut a large loin of beef, (she had told him this much, that it was a beef roast), took out the bone and by dint of cutting, shaping, using skewers and by tying, he made a very good imitation of a duck. Being well satisfied with his progress, he then took a knuckle bone from a mutton and painted it in imitation of a duck's head and neck, and fastened it in place securely; then standing off and viewing it critically, he chuckled "Well, Mrs. Lancaster will have her 'Duck Roast,' and in time, too."

He delivered it personally, explaining to her how to garnish it after it was roasted. Mrs. Lancaster was delighted and Butcher May has done a thriving business in "Duck Roasts" as well as in other meats since. So much for ingenuity.

1900 has many proud distinctions over its sister years. Among them is the fact that it can be expressed in fewer Roman numerals than any year of the last hundred. M. C. M. it reads. For the first time the Roman numerals have the advantage of brevity.

The American nation has one marked race peculiarity. It really can't live up to the idea of a hero. In fact when it makes popular heroes of the men who have done great deeds it becomes so hysterical and exclamatory that the reaction is inevitable. It has followed in every case of hero worship. Admiral Dewey took the matter too seriously when a noisy storm of protest arose on his transference of his gift house to his wife. We certainly can not criticise the French for their fickle ways when we give such an exhibition. Back of all the noise is the sober sense of the nation that is not noisy with praise or hysterical with blame. That element has supported the Admiral.

New Year resolutions seem part of a past system. The restless modern is not much given to self examination. He does not search his own soul for lapses in thought or his actions for failures in word or deed. Consequently he has little use for celebrating the New Year by any reform resolutions. He prefers to make vague general promises of improvement and to ignore special instances. Washington's Rules for conduct show the searching self criticism of an earlier generation. We of these later days don't promise much to ourselves and so are spared any feeling of condemnation by failure. New Year resolutions certainly must be good resolutions but the modern unregenerate takes few of such passing contracts. We are satisfied to allow the place nameless to ears polite to keep the pavement it acquired during the years when human nature was more morbidly conscientious.

We have "fin-de-siecle'ed" so much that we have worn out the idea before the fact arrived. It has come at last 1900. The year's end always makes a momentary pause even in the rush and sweep of modern life. We have a moment of "hind sight" and another moment of "fore sight" and then the present with its insistent, persistent clamor shuts out the past and leaves no moment of speculation as to the future. When the end of the year and the end of the century come together it cannot be lightly passed. The changes that the century has wrought make even the most careless thought-ful. Pages could hardly outline the political, social and scientific development of the century. The greatest political change has been the death of absolute rule and the growth of representative government. Even the least optimistic person must feel that the world has grown better. The privilege of witnessing the close of a century comes but once in a lifetime and to but few people. The New Year issues on the Twentieth Century. Hail and farewell!

The Department of Labor has recently published a report containing a list of 1300 women's clubs. The names furnish an interesting study and some throw light upon the object of the club. In other cases the names are veritable puzzles. Five languages have been searched for appellations for the clubs—English, American, Indian, Latin, French and Greek. Fbilitscipom may seem an imposing name but one has an awestruck feeling when he realizes that the fearful and wonderful combination means philosophy, literature, science, music and art. Certainly no "pent up Utica" restrains the powers of that club. Among the peculiar names are Olla Podrida, Tekeosnoon, Old Maids Social Club, La Coterie, the U & I Club, Emitte Lucem Tuam, Ossoli, Wixson, Hypatia, and Igdrasil. Over the Tea Cups is a favorite name and the glories of Sorosis repeat themselves even to the wilds of Skowhegan. The Sphinx and the Entre Nous convey a suggestion of secrecy that ill accords with the popular conception of women's weak point. One club evidently gave up the task of searching for a cognomen and indicated their frame of mind by calling their club the "What's In a Name" Club. At least half of the thirteen hundred names depart from the beaten track of the "Woman's Club of Blankville" and ransack five languages for significant titles. The purposes and papers of these clubs seem serious and learned enough to dismay any really frivolous person who may have associated tea, tattle and tatting with any gathering of women. But the inclinations to coquette with the muses in a distinctly feminine fashion is shown in the names.

The science of electricity is, comparatively speaking, in its infancy. It has opened a new field of work and the positions calling for expert labor are highly paid. It is estimated that at least fifty women in the United States have taken courses in electricity and a fair proportion of women are earning a good livelihood, either as practical electricians or as lecturers or teachers of the subject. In the manufacture of the tiny filament used in electric light bulbs, women are conceded to be the best workers. They have a lightness and deftness of touch that fits them for the work. Hundreds of women are employed in these factories. The field for women in the lines of electricity requiring expert knowledge is a broad one. In proportion to the numbers who have made a special study of the science the per cent. of actual business success is very high. In fact the results show that it is a more promising field than law, theology or even medicine. One of the five examiners in the electrical department of the patent office is a woman. The largest number of inventions by women are in the line of medical electricity. Some of the physicians who have made the greatest success of electrical treatment are women. The field is certainly widening, the few who have entered it have won more than average success. There is a fascination in the study, a practical and immediate financial return for expert knowledge and opportunity to pursue the study at Universities and technical schools. It is far more practical than many of the fields which women are striving to enter. All in all, the woman in search of a vocation may fare worse than to turn her attention to this wonderful science.

Queen Victoria has presented 100,000 pounds of chocolate to her soldiers in South Africa. This fact has been the cause of much merriment especially to the French newspaper people. There is an historical significance in the act that is lost to the average observer. It shows the wide gulf between the position of an English sovereign to-day and the time when the King led his troops to battle while his crown trembled in the balance. Elizabeth, the Virgin Queen, rode before her army who were mustered to repel the attack of the Spanish. She exhorted them to fight and cried, "I have the heart of a King and of a King of England, too, and think foul scorn that Parma or Spain or any prince of Europe should dare to invade the borders of my realm." George II. was the last English king who personally led his troops in battle. In the War of the Austrian Succession or King George's War, as it was called in this country, he led the English at the great battle of Dettingen. Here he dismounted from his horse and waving his sword cried: "Come boys, now behave like men and the French will soon run." Those times and that spirit seem far separated from modern ways. The spirit is really the same, however, as the one that prompts the English Queen to make her gift of chocolate. It is the substance rather than the spirit of the gift that awakens mirth. It would seem that Queen Victoria might be familiar with a scene in a modern play where a fugitive soldier takes refuge in a house and is found eagerly devouring chocolate creams. He declares that they are the best campaign ration for a soldier as chocolate will support life longer than any other food. Whether it be philosophy or philanthropy the soldiers have their chocolate and the public has had its fun.

There are few topics that furnish a wider field for theory than does the topic of the nutritive value of foods. After centuries of medical investigation we are not yet sure whether man flourishes best on a meat or a vegetable diet, whether coffee, tea, tobacco or alcoholic beverages are really harmful or just what elements and what proportions are most conducive to perfect health. We have a scientific assertion to one effect from some authority only to find it contradicted by another. Average humanity goes calmly, placidly on eating everything that comes in its way without the slightest regard to "what's in it." Nature seems to have fitted man out with the possibility of adapting himself to everything in the food line except the want of it. The latest turn that discussion has taken is not the theory of "what to eat" but the practice of not eating at all. The reform began first by the strenuous advocacy of the practice of going without breakfast. We were ill because we ate too much, said these reformers. Breakfast was accordingly stricken from the list. The excitement over a breakfastless condition of existence lapsed when suddenly some of the city papers commenced a protest against the lunch habit. Lunch was an unnecessary evil, the system did not require the food and it took much valuable time. People would be healthier and richer if they omitted the midday lunch. Then came the attack on the dinner at six o'clock. We can imagine the consternation of an earnest seeker after truth and health who endeavored to follow the advice of all these people until he found himself breakfastless, dinnerless and supperless. His only hope lies in the adoption of some of the concentrated foods. Science is determined to do away with eating as an function and the food of the future will contain all the necessary elements to nourish the human mechanism but it will take the form of pellets or tablets. One of these may be quickly swallowed and the machine will have been fed so it can run. Eating as a function will entirely disappear. No more shall we hear of the "festive board" or of after dinner speakers. No one can be inspired to eloquence merely by bolting a tablet. The labor of the world will be lessened more than half. No dishes to wash, no marketing to do, the year's food supply can be purchased in a moment and the tablets dealt out to each person. The advocates of concentrated food are quite as scientific as the advocates of no food at all. Average humanity will doubtless continue to "eat to live," the few will still "live to eat," and the vegetarian, the fruit-and-nut diet people and the people who don't believe in any diet at all will still argue. It is doubtless well to direct popular attention to the topic, but the scientific side is yet to be solved and the "theories" only furnish fresh opportunity to people who cultivate fads.

PADEREWSKI'S HAND SHAKE.

The return of Ignace Paderewski for a season's tour in America makes everything told of the great pianist of double interest. COMFORT remembers hearing a well-known musical critic telling of meeting him at a dinner given in one of our great centers; and on being asked what impressed him most about the artist, replied it was his handshake.

"Why," said he, "to shake hands with him is an experience one never forgets, I don't mean on account of the distinguished honor, but because of the tremendous impression of actual power one gets. I can't remember that I ever shook hands with a man having such a grip. You feel as if your hand were in a double-levered press and it will bring tears to your eyes.

"While we were talking over the success of the evening a reporter came in and Paderewski, in the height of an enthusiastic burst, seized his hand from above in a quick, nervous grasp like the spring of a trap. As he poured into the journalist's ear a few words of excited thanks for something he had written he proceeded to turn on the pressure.

"The long, white slender fingers were like the lips of a vise while through them shot a pressure only to be likened to the charging of a wire with electricity of many meters force and rushing down into his finger tips. Thus he cordially shook the crushed and limp hand of the writer, who stood unconsciously writhing in pain, while the player turned on alternating currents by way of emphasizing his rapidly articulated words.

"Why, his hands are as muscular as a prize-fighter's. He shakes hands with the same nerve and force as he plays any of his musical gems. There is nervous force, tenacity, energy and grip in him if his handshake is anything to be guided by."

The long winter evenings are with us once more and again the piano and organ are doing their share of the work in entertaining. Don't bore your friends and neighbors with the worn and hackneyed pieces which our grandfathers enjoyed, but play and sing the latest and best compositions. The place to get the latest, best and most popular is through the wonderful music offer COMFORT makes every reader on another page. Turn to it now while you think of it.

The Passing of the Coon Song.

As has often been pointed out in the musical department of COMFORT, the conditions and environments often cause an epoch of music and songs of a distinct character, be it gloomy or gay. The civil war was the greatest producer of sentimental music we have ever had in America, and it was a lack of inspiration in the musical line that caused many people to consider the late Spanish war merely one of commercial interest and not a sentimental matter. In England there is to-day an outburst of patriotic music caused by the Boer war, which has scarcely ever been equalled in history.

This thought is caused by the wave of popularity which has existed since the introduction of "coon" songs in America. These old darky songs and lullabys were first made really popular by that gifted actress, May Irwin, whose instant and continued success in a white-faced portrayal and imitation of the lusty, healthy darkey wench has done more to make this style music popular than anything else. Of late we have had a surfeit of coon song and what is called "rag time" music. All being either negro melody or imitations of it, generally in two-step time. But after a while too much sweet will cloy and it is evident that the coon song has had its day. From the day when every music store window held nothing but cartoon music pages of cake walks and negro dudes, we are coming to a line of more dignified and artistic music.

The new sentimental songs written more in accord with our old ideas of merit and sentiment are coming back and the day of the coon and the cake is slowly and surely drawing to a close. Popular as this style music has been it is doubtful if any of it will be long remembered

CONDUCTED BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

THERE seems to be no end to the inventions by which the bicycle is to be made to serve Uncle Sam—from its use as a postal carrier up to its utility in war. The latest idea comes from a Yankee inventor and is nothing less than a huge fighting machine, the picture of which is shown on this page. It is, in fact nothing more nor less than a gigantic military automobile—a fort on wheels, big enough to run right over the enemy's entrenchments, and occupied by a force of soldiers sufficiently large to be termed a garrison.

The wheels of this automobile fortress are to be fifty feet in diameter, provided with pneumatic tires to enable it to run more easily over hostile earthworks, and the body of the vehicle is clad in steel armor, impenetrable to rifle bullets or cannon shot. Through suitable windows, or portholes, if they may be so termed, project rapid-fire guns—one-pounders and six-pounders, with perhaps a couple of Colt "automatics" to throw a continuous rain of small bullets. Meanwhile through smaller openings, the soldiers are able to direct a destructive fire upon the foe with Krag-Jorgensen rifles.

One advantage of this new war machine is that it travels so fast as easily to overtake the enemy. Of course they may attempt to run away, but what will be the use when they can so readily be caught up with? Besides, a traveling fort—a contrivance appalling in its very novelty—is likely to paralyze them with terror. It should be explained that the giant automobile may be run either by gasoline or electricity.

Another point worth mentioning is that machines of this description may be built in this country and forwarded in sections to be put together and sent into the field. One may easily imagine half a dozen of them at the seat of war operating together in a battle with the enemy, rushing upon their entrenchments, over-running them, crushing the fugitives beneath the huge wheels, and demolishing regiment after regiment with storms of projectiles discharged from above. The demoralizing effect likely to be produced is easily imagined.

Each of these military automobiles is provided with a sort of apparatus in front which somewhat resembles in shape the cowcatcher of a locomotive engine. It is armed with bayonet-like knives, and in action it will serve to scoop up and cut in pieces thousands of fighting men. On top of the perambulating fortress is an armored casemate, cylindrical in form, which provides a safe shelter for eight or ten riflemen.

"If you intend cycling through the winter months, it is well to have your spokes thoroughly examined," says a veteran. "Sometimes the fitting of the heads through the steel rim is loosened; water enters and the tires get damp and rot sets in. A little touch of enamel about the spoke heads would be serviceable in resisting wet. Tires rarely wear out; they succumb to rot. From painful experience I have found that if damp gets in between rubber and canvass they will not dry in a tight, inflated tire."

A new brake for a bicycle which will be seen next spring has a rod connected with the saddle, and this rod has at the other end the usual rubber skid. The saddle works on a lever, and when the rider wishes to apply the brake he slightly leans back and down goes the brake on the back tire. Happily the number of brakeless riders is decreasing. Men are getting a better appreciation of the value of their necks. Still, there are riders who do not fancy brakes, relying on their back pedalling. Should they be going down a steep incline and find they are not strong enough in back pedalling to keep absolute control, let them slip one hand under the back of their saddle and grip it tight. The power of resistance is vastly increased.

The front forks are subjected to a severe test in uphill riding. It is at this point that the greatest number of breakages occur. Indeed, in the last two seasons, since cheaper bicycles have come so much in general use, bicycle repairers find that about one-fifth of their work comes from this source, the smash occurring mostly at the crown. As a bicycle is rendered useless by such an occurrence wheelmen should make sure that the forks are strengthened at the crown. In the cheaper grades of machines this important point is too often neglected, it is said.

Two items are necessary to prevent side slipping—a well inflated tire and even pedalling. It should be noticed that tandem tires, in particular, require to be pumped commensurate with the extra weight they have to carry. A tire that is well inflated is a tire which presents less surface at the point of contact with the ground, and, as is readily understood, has a much firmer grip on the road.

Many wheelmen take their rides during the summer months as a sort of constitutional, because wheeling gives them the exercise that keeps them in good health. But with the approach of winter, damp weather and muddy roads, the "constitutional" is abandoned and the bicycle stowed away. Why should not these riders who do not care to brave miry roads and yet want cycling exercise, adopt what are known as home trainers? In England home trainers are unknown, but in this country they are common. The appliance is simple. There are two rollers on which rests the rear tire, and these rollers communicate with a forward roller, on which rests the front wheel. You cycle on these rollers—you pedal an immense distance but do not advance one inch. It takes a little practice to get into the way of the home trainer, but of its usefulness there is no doubt. In a contest on home trainers in a San Francisco Athletic Club each rider had a flying start, and the winner covered the mile in forty-eight seconds. This was accomplished by the absence of air resistance.

An incident in bicycle stealing is recounted by "The Irish Cyclist." A rider named Smith left his bicycle outside a shop. He emerged just in time to see a man named Munro riding away with it. He took the machine nearest to go in pursuit, and this was a tandem. One of the riders saw Smith take it and seizing another man's wheel, a single, went after Smith. The owner of the last mentioned wheel saw no other bicycle handy on which to give chase and jumped into a cab. Smith on the tandem finally caught Munro and the others coming up in turn got their bicycles and a satisfactory explanation. Munro was sentenced to two months. Evidently his pride was more wounded by the street episode than by the sentence, for he said that no single man on a tandem would have caught him had he not been riding in long trousers.

It looks as if the motor vehicle would follow closely in the track of the wheel. It was only a little more than ten years ago that "safeties" began to be a popular means of transportation, and ten years from now the motor carriage will no doubt have a permanent hold throughout this country.

To do away with the tool bag a Western man uses the interior of the handle bars for holding the pump, oiler, tire repair outfit, wrench, etc. The pump is telescopic, with a recess in the plunger for the repair kit. The oiler and tool kit holder are made in combination. Each grip is made with a bayonet clutch that locks the corresponding telescopic outfit. The rest of the interior of the handle bar may be used to carry a supply of carbide.

AN AUTOMOBILE FORTRESS.

It is common knowledge that the majority of police gauge the pace of a wheelman by the speed at which his pedals are revolving. Thus the rider of a low gear often suffers for the sins of his high geared brother. But it is pointed out that those who use the free wheel will be able to completely mystify the vigilant policeman. The scorcher, as soon as he sights the enemy, has simply to cease pedaling, and sail by with the seraphic smile of the accomplished free wheeler.

I frequently have requests for further information regarding inventions spoken of here, or to give addresses of inventors. These I cannot furnish. It would be better to apply to the United States Patent Office at Washington, D. C.

Can you use three dollars a day? Of course you can. Every person can. See back page of this paper.

$1,000 FOR A CERTAIN OLD COIN.

WHILE there are some people who have a vague idea that coins issued 100 or 1000 years ago are worth fabulous sums, yet very few know that coins issued only a few years ago are at a large premium. For instance, the silver dollars of 1803 and many of the earlier ones. The first Columbian half-dollar, issued 1892, sold for $1,000. All the half-dollars from 1879 to 1890 are at a premium, also Isabella quarters of 1893, the old issue of the quarters and half-dollars of 1853, twenty-cent pieces 1876 to 1878; five and three-cent pieces of 1877; last issue of the two-cent copper and three-cent silver pieces; first issue of the nickel cents, all gold dollars and three-dollar gold pieces; all Territorial and California coins from 1849 to 1880, and thousands of earlier American and Foreign coins, Canadian especially. There is also a premium on some coins with MINT MARKS O, S, C, D or CC; also on fractional currency, colonial, continental and Confederate bills and old POSTAGE STAMPS. THE GLOBE reports that a coin was found in Galveston worth $5,000. THE NEW YORK JOURNAL says that a cent was plowed up at Aurora, N. Y., worth $1,200, and that Mr. Castle paid $4,400 FOR A STAMP found at Louisville, Ky. THE WORLD says: "Many people have become wealthy by looking after old coins and stamps." THE HOME JOURNAL says: "Coin and stamp collecting is a profitable business, as there are but few in it. The Numismatic Bank buys from Agents all over the country, and pays them big sums." Coins that are very hard to find in one section are often easily found in others. A Boston baker sold 116 coppers for $6,915, 29 silver coins for $4,713, and 4 gold coins for $1,700, and others have done nearly as well. MR. F. W. AYER sold recently a lot of stamps, collected since 1892, to Stanley Gibbons for $250,000. THE COMMERCIAL AND FINANCIAL NEWS says: "The Numismatic Bank is not only the largest institution of its kind, but as reliable, safe and trustworthy to deal with as any National Bank. The enormous business done by them is the result of SQUARE DEALING and liberality."—Send two stamps for our illustrated circular on rare coins and stamps, which may prove to be your stepping stone to wealth and independence. NUMISMATIC BANK, (Dept. RHEUMATISM IS DEAD!
Long Live OXIEN, the King of Remedies that Killed it.

No more infernal tortures, no more roastings of the flesh with red hot irons, no more lightning shocks from the electric battery or dosings with dangerous drugs.

RHEUMATISM HAS BEEN CONQUERED by Oxien the triumph of medicine, the Godsend of the age. Absolute cures are now certain, and Oxien is making them every day. In this connection

WE HAVE A WORD TO SAY.

Oxien was last year put to the test as a remedy for Rheumatism and it made a record of absolute cures in Acute Rheumatism, frequently called rheumatic fever, Pericarditis (inflammation of the investing membrane of the heart), Endocarditis (inflammation of the living membrane of the heart), subacute rheumatism, sometimes applied to the less severe attacks of the disease, chronic rheumatism, which swells and twists the joints and sciatica, or neuralgia of the sciatic nerve. In fact Oxien is guaranteed to cure Rheumatism in any form. Thousands jump for joy and many write as follows:

Received OXIEN O. K. Found it far superior to what you represent. Have tried everything I could hear of for rheumatism. For ten years I have been crippled up with this terrible disease. Laid in bed one whole year. Could not turn or feed myself and when I was able to walk on crutches (which I did for four years) was crooked and unable to straighten up, but Oxien did it and you can imagine how happy I am now. Yours sincerely. Geo. F. Lawton, Olympia, Wash., Feby. 9th, 1898.

AMERICA TRIUMPHANT

Prof. S. A. Weltmer, the Great Magnetic Healer, of Nevada, Mo., an American Born, the First to Discover a Method Whereby the Curing of Disease is Brought Into the Domain of an Exact Science.

Almost every great discovery owes its origin to the master mind of an American citizen. The curing of disease, which has attracted the attention of more great minds than any other profession, has at last been placed into the domain of an exact science. All diseases can now be cured without aid of drugs or the surgeon's knife through a method of magnetic healing originated by that eminent scientist, Prof. S. A. Weltmer, of Nevada, Mo. Just pause for a moment and grasp the enormity of this grand discovery. Think of the thousands of our noble women who have suffered the tortures and agonies of female troubles, who could get neither relief nor cure from the medical profession. These great sufferers can now be cured and brought back into their health which will permit them to enjoy life; and then, again, think of the legion of men who have become weak and debilitated through early indiscretions, overwork and dissipation, and who have taken gallons of obnoxious drugs with no cure in sight; they can now look up with hope in their eyes, for there is a positive and permanent cure for them in this efficacious method of Magnetic Healing known as Weltmerism. The archenemy of mankind—disease—has at last found its master, for Weltmerism, in a perfectly natural manner, goes to the very seat of the trouble, and it can positively be stated that this wonderful discovery will cure all diseases, no matter what the nature or of how long standing. More than 100,000 men and women who have been cured of every disease known through Weltmerism are positive evidence that dispels further doubt. Weltmerism does not only cure those cases that go to Nevada for treatment, but through the method known as the Absent Treatment it cures at a distance just as readily. The American School of Magnetic Healing has received thousands upon thousands of letters from men and women who have been cured by this New Science, and who thought it was their duty to testify the fact of their cure for the benefit of human beings that are suffering. We are permitted to publish a few of these testimonials.

PROF. WELTMER.

T. T. Rodes, of Paris, Mo., the Prosecuting Attorney for Monroe County, suffered for years from Sciatic Rheumatism; tried everything without benefit; was instantly cured through Prof. Weltmer's Absent Treatment. Mr. Rodes has recently won fame as the attorney in the celebrated Jester case. Mrs. C. R. Graham, of Boise City, Iowa, was afflicted for nine years with rheumatism; she could not walk without crutches or lift her hands to her head; she paid out $3,000 with doctors before coming to Nevada; she now proclaims herself cured and a happy woman, through Weltmerism. Mrs. D. H. Allen, of Aurora Springs, Mo., was in a hopeless condition, as she suffered from consumption in its worst form; she could not sleep without the aid of morphine; tried everything without relief; fully restored by Prof. Weltmer's Absent Treatment. D. E. Alford, of Rubens, Jewell Co. Kans., suffered for three years with Kidney and Stomach troubles; tried the best medical authorities, but was told that his case was hopeless; took Prof. Weltmer's Absent Treatment, and in the three days was cured. Mrs. Jennie L. Lynch, Lakeview, Mo., was for two years afflicted with ulceration of the womb, heart and stomach troubles and general debility; was reduced to a mere skeleton; after taking gallons of obnoxious medicines, without relief, she tried the Weltmer Absent Treatment. In less than thirty days she was entirely relieved and gained fifteen pounds. Mr. G. W. Hightower, Tiff City, Mo., was a total wreck; suffered many years with stomach, liver and kindred troubles; tried everything without relief; fully restored by Prof. Weltmer's Absent Method. Mrs. M. M. Walker, Poca, W. Va., suffered with eczema, indigestion and other troubles; dozens of doctors failed to give any relief; she was permanently restored by Prof. Weltmer's Absent Method in two months. By writing Prof. S. A. Weltmer, Nevada, Mo., you will receive, free of charge, The Magnetic Journal, a 40-page illustrated magazine, and a long list of the most remarkable cures ever made.

Weltmer Method Taught to Others

This Noble Profession Has Already Brought Fame and Fortune to Many of Its Students.

Prof. S. A. Weltmer, the originator of this marvelous method, will teach the art to others how to cure every known disease without the aid of drugs or the surgeon's knife. Any one who desires can learn this noble profession. Any one who learns can practice it. He has abundantly proven this by the large number who have been instructed by him and who are in the active practice of healing by his method. He will teach you in ten days, either by mail or personal instructions, his wonderful method, through which wealth and fame can be earned. Full instructions will be sent free of charge to any one writing to Prof. J. H. Kelly Sec'y, Nevada, Mo.

PROF. KELLY Sec'y and Treas.

Art Training in the Public Schools.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

A WONDERFUL advancement has been made within recent years in the art training which is given the pupils of the public schools. The character and scope of the work which is undertaken along this line is often little understood even by parents, who are apt to think of their children's drawing lessons as a repetition of their own training a score or more of years ago; a training which consisted in reproducing the studies in a copy book and the child who learned to copy best a picture of a Greek vase, an Egyptian border, or a bit of rustic life, was pronounced possessed of the greatest amount of artistic talent.

Any one who has studied into the present methods of the schools will realize very quickly that all this has changed. The children are not taught to copy at all, but to draw forms as they see them. They are taught first of all to see, and then to reproduce what they see on paper. Nor is this all. They are taught the history and the schools of art, as well as its principles, although this is not given them by means of text books or even as a conscious study. It is combined with the drawing lessons and so is learned in such a manner as never to be forgotten.

The art training is begun with the first year of school, and is then in reality a sense training. The child is also taught position and manner of holding his tools, and right habits of work are instilled. Less attention is paid by the intelligent teacher to what appears upon the paper, than to the method of work. Straight lines, as straight lines, are never even mentioned, but all criticism is made along the line of truth. If a child makes a picture in which a boy is larger than a house he is asked: "Is it true that the boy is larger than the house?" The child at once sees the mistake he has made and looks more carefully next time. The early training is largely a quickening of the perceptions. As soon as the child has learned to see correctly, he will reproduce well.

Dictation lessons are given in drawing. It was only in the second grade that the drawing teacher recently said to her class: "Do you ever go skating?" Of course they did.

"Where do you go skating?" was the next question.

"On Lake Calhoun," was the answer, mentioning a lake near the school.

"Well, then," resumed the teacher, "let us suppose we are on this side of the lake skating, and there is a big tree beside us. What is there on the opposite bank?"

"Woods," the children answer.

"Yes," said the teacher, "and above the woods there is the sky. Now, which tree would look larger, the one beside us or those on the opposite bank?"

"The one beside us," was the prompt response.

"And suppose there were some boys skating on the opposite side of the lake. Which would look larger, those close to us or those across the lake?"

"Those close to us," they answered again.

"About how high would the opposite shore line come upon the boys on the opposite bank?"

This was a harder question, but some of the children knew. "As high as their heads," they answered, and they were right; not because they understood that the horizon line was level with the eye, but because they had been upon the lake and had seen all this.

"Now," said the teacher, "draw a picture for me of what you would see at the lake. Have a tree near, some trees and a house on the other side, and some boys skating over there."

The resulting pictures were a remarkable group. Not that they were wonderful in detail of execution, but their grasp of the subject in its relations was truly a revelation.

In those pictures in which some of the objects were out of proportion, the teacher had only to ask the familiar question, "Is it true?" when the child would mentally review the scene which was familiar to him, and would see the mistake.

Much depends upon the teacher's being able to find the child's point of view, in giving a successful lesson. She must select objects or scenes which are familiar to him, and in which he is interested. If the general lesson of the day has been about the hen, and he has learned interesting things regarding her habits, and there is a hen in the schoolroom, as there usually would be during this study, then the drawing lesson of the day should be of the hen. At another time it might be of a kitten, or a dog.

The constant referring of all points of uncertainty to the standard of truth, must in time have its influence upon the character of the child, as well as upon his drawing.

The lessons in the lower grades are all made pleasure lessons, all technical terms being eliminated. By the time the fourth grade is reached the children are taught to use their pencils in determining relative proportions and perspective, by holding the pencil at a distance from the eye. But the term perspective is seldom if ever used, even then.

In the seventh and eighth grades simple landscapes are drawn, and the children are taught where to place the horizon line. Some exercises in designing are also given. This much for the work of the various grades, which of course is a modification of the general plan, according to the age and advancement of the children dealt with.

The general outline of work for a single year for the older students deals with Egyptian ornament. The history of Egyptian art is studied, and the symbolism of the figures employed. All the work in historic ornament for the year refers to and deals with that of the Egyptians. Another year Greek art is studied; and by this means the various art periods are kept distinct in the pupil's mind, and his appreciation of what is really good in art is wonderfully strengthened.

During the child's study of historic ornament, and of the different schools of art, it is possible for the parents to be of the greatest assistance, by reading and studying with him at home along the same line, getting books from the library, and visiting art galleries.

Throughout the work the teacher seeks to strengthen and stimulate the pupil's interest, and also to bring out the educative thought which is back of every drawing lesson given. The success of the lesson, in its broadest sense, must depend in a marked degree upon the teacher. The drawing teachers go from school to school, visiting each as often as time will permit. The lessons between these visits are given by the regular teacher of the room, and as a consequence there is a wide difference in the results attained, for some teachers are enthusiastic about the drawing while others look upon it as a task, in which they have little natural interest.

It is not expected that the new system of drawing will make artists of all the children, any more than it is expected that all will be professional mathematicians, but it gives to many an added means of expression which they will enjoy all through life, and it develops the hidden talent of those who are naturally gifted.

Nor is this all. If the standard of art in our own country is raised, it will be as the result of a deeper and more intelligent appreciation of art upon the part of the general public, and nowhere can such an appreciation be better implanted than in the minds of the school children of the present day.

To this end much is being done in the schools to foster a love of art in the children, aside from the work of the drawing teachers.

In some of our leading cities there are School Art Leagues, for the furtherance of the art interests of the pupils of the schools, and in other cities where no such League exists the teachers of drawing, aided by the principals of the schools, clubs and any others who are interested, take active measures for providing the schools of the city with works of art.

Good pictures are selected and are placed upon the walls. Objects of art, such as casts, bas relief, also help to arouse the art instincts of the child. Some of these are contributed by artists and private individuals but more of them are given by the children themselves. In Minneapolis one of the local papers has a department for the children in which prizes are offered to those presenting the best papers on given topics. These prizes, during the school year, consist of pictures, not for the individual child but for the school room in which the child belongs at the time of writing. The enthusiasm which this plan has aroused among the children of the city is of the heartiest nature, and a great many pictures have been won in this way. In some schools the children earn money by putting yards to rights, selling old rubbers, bottles, or paper rags, and putting the money thus earned into a fund for their school. Entertainments are also given for the purpose of raising funds, and twice a year envelopes are circulated among the school children into which voluntary offerings for a piano and picture fund are placed.

In these and various other ways the pictures and objects of art accumulate, and while the children enjoy them, they are also educated by them and given a broader culture.

The custom of presenting class memorials has also been a means of enriching the art collections of the schools. This applies more particularly to the high schools, but is being adopted to some extent by the highest class of the grammar schools upon its graduation. Many of these memorials take the form of pictures and statuary, and are very valuable.

Only pictures of real artistic merit are placed upon the school walls and it is a matter of surprise to many to find that the children enjoy the class of pictures shown. It is a mistake to suppose that children can only appreciate juveniles or showy pictures. Among those which the children themselves have chosen are pictures by Raphael, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Millet, Corot, Van Dyke, Rosa Bonheur, Breton, Mme. Le Brun, and many others of equal rank. Children love the pictures of the Madonna; the peasant scenes of Millet; and appreciate to a greater extent than would be believed, the classic reproductions.

In some of our cities art exhibits are held at the close of the school year, in which both the work of the scholars themselves is shown, and the art treasures of the schools as well. Such an exhibition is usually made free, as its chief object is educative, and its aim is to reach as large a number as possible. The exhibit broadens and stimulates the art interest of the children who visit it, and it also wakens a spirit of co-operation upon the part of the parents. To many of them it is a revelation.

Another class to whom such an exhibit is of very real value, are the teachers from smaller towns and country schools who visit the cities in the summer. The display opens their eyes to new possibilities for their own school, and so the influence widens.

CONDUCTED BY DIGITUS.

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living palmists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:

Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to COMFORT PALMISTRY CLUB, Augusta, Maine.

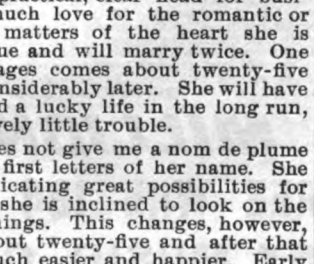
No notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheet of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carefully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixatif, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an atomizer. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-greased, palm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Several minutes will be required to get this impression and great care must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putty is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixatif.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

Also, that letters not complying with them will go into the waste-basket. Readings cannot appear for several months after impressions are sent.



AS there are several hands to be read this month I must leave the questions to go over until another time. The first belongs to "Resigned." This shows the hand of a good business man with instincts for money getting and one who will be successful in the long run, although he may meet with some discouragements at first. His life line is a double one all the way indicating a long life with comparatively good health and strong constitution, but toward the end there are several fine lines rising from it showing that specially good luck has attended his efforts, although early in life he was bound down and had rather a hard time getting started. There was some disappointment with regard to affections at about the age of twenty or a little later, but from about twenty-five on his life is very successful and he gets what he wants. I do not think he marries until he is thirty-five or more. There seems to be no particular reason why he should take the nom de plume of "Resigned" as far as I can see. His hand indicates good fortune and success after the first twenty-five years. He is fond of the opposite sex and will be quite popular among them. He will make a good husband and father and a good citizen in every way.

"RESIGNED."

"Loyal" has a hand that shows refinement and a gentle disposition with love of music, flowers and all beautiful things. She has an open, frank, generous nature with a great deal of tact in dealing with others which makes her many friends. She has the courage of her convictions and when she thinks any course is a wise one, pursues it and will be able to carry it out to the end. Her health will be good in the main, but she will not live to be a very old woman. She will travel a good deal, especially during her last years. She has strong intellectual powers with a practical, clear head for business, but not much love for the romantic or imaginary. In matters of the heart she is steadfast and true and will marry twice. One of these marriages comes about twenty-five and the other considerably later. She will have good success and a lucky life in the long run, with comparatively little trouble.

"M. A. J." does not give me a nom de plume and so I use the first letters of her name. She has a hand indicating great possibilities for the future, but she is inclined to look on the dark side of things. This changes, however, when she is about twenty-five and after that she finds life much easier and happier. Early in life she is somewhat weak and vacillating in her ideas and has very little self-reliance or courage. This is partly the result of circumstances, however, as she was born with a naturally happy disposition. If she would cultivate a little more energy she would find that her happiness depends largely upon herself and her own will. She has been too dependent upon other people and she needs to realize that happiness comes from within and not from without. Some special good fortune will reach her about the age of thirty-five or forty which she will find of great value to her. She will marry not far from twenty-five, but I think the first marriage will not be at all satisfactory. She will marry again a dozen years later or so with much better results. There is liability of a severe illness or accident at about the age of twenty-five which must be guarded against. After that her health is good up to about sixty. I do not see that the life line goes much beyond that age. She will travel a good deal during the middle of her life. It is not possible to state in these predictions the exact month or year that a thing will happen. We can only say at about such an age. On the whole, I see a great deal of happiness and good fortune in this hand, although the subject is impatient of delay and unwilling to wait for good luck.

"LOYAL."

"America" has an excellent hand—one of the best I have seen for some time, although it shows that she has a nervous temperament which she needs to control. She is a very refined and sensitive person, fond of music and flowers, pictures and literature. She is inclined somewhat to despondency at times. She will excel in imaginative writing if she takes it up. She has a great gift for that sort of thing and either as a writer of romantic fiction or imaginative poetry she would meet with great success. This may not come all at once, but if she has perseverance enough to go ahead in spite of obstacles, she can become famous as a writer. There are several signs of this in her hand, with splendid lines on the Mount of Apollo which indicate reputation and success. There is a cross on Jupiter and a distinct Fate line rising from the wrist and going straight up. I see one marriage at about the age of twenty-five or thirty, but with her marriage is not the greatest thing in life. She has wonderful gifts and if she can develop perseverance enough to carry them through, she will make a great success of life. She will have to look out for her health, as she has been somewhat delicate in childhood. There is a crease broken into the life line which is offset by a stronger line, showing that her health will be much improved and that she will grow stronger as the years progress. The life line ends in a star which indicates celebrity at the close of her life. I should advise "America" to take up the line of historical writing. First, study the local history of some locality in her vicinity and then select her characters and go ahead.

ANOTHER READER HAS BEEN MAKING MONEY EASILY.

I noticed in your valuable paper that one of your readers had been very successful selling Baird's Non-Alcoholic Flavoring Powders, and thought my experience would be interesting too. It is simply wonderful how much better these new fruit flavoring powders are than the liquid extracts sold in stores, when you stop to think that they cost only about half as much. You use them for cakes, custards, candies, ice cream, etc., just like the liquid. We used them ourselves and liked them so well that I wrote the manufacturers, Baird Mfg. Co., 128 Baird Bldg., Pittsburg, Pa., for samples and tried selling them to my neighbors. I only commenced a short time ago, but the powders are fast becoming celebrated around here and I have built up a steady trade from regular customers, often making over $25.00 a week. I never knew of such an easy way to make money and I would recommend anyone having a little spare time to write this firm, for they are very generous in their dealings. R. L. C.

THE MAGICAL SPONGE.

THE WONDER OF THE 20th CENTURY.

For Polishing and Cleaning Windows, Signs, Mirrors, Show Cases, Gold, Silver, Nickel, also Jewelry, Copper, Brass and Tin.

For the Bath IT HAS NO EQUAL.

A Labor-Saving device entirely new and universal in demand. Will last a lifetime and costs but Twenty-five cents. Just on the market and over 500 Gross sold last month. Every family in the land wants one or more. All you do to sell them is simply show the lady of the house or the office man how it works on his window and you will depart with one less every time, but in its place a quarter.

The Magical Sponge differs from the ordinary sponge in nature, while the common sponge is of vegetable origin and found in the ocean, the Magical Sponge is a mineral production and found in the United States, dug from the ground, carefully prepared and manufactured into sponges for the Housekeeper, Merchant, Liveryman, Metal Workers, and all persons who desire to keep their homes, offices, and business places in a clean and healthy condition.

No Soap or water is needed or even used with the Magical Sponge for Cleaning Windows or any outside Metal. In the winter time it has no equal, it does not freeze, and no water being used (other than what is in the sponge) all trouble and hard work is avoided. For Cleaning Baseboards, Window Sills, Wainscoating and painted surfaces, it acts like a charm; takes all the finger marks, spots, grease and dirt away, leaving a Clean, Polished Surface.

Good men wanted all over the country to handle these goods, big inducements offered steady workers, and exclusive sale. To Agents, Salesmen, and house to house canvassers, who send us 25 cents for a 6 months' subscription, we will send one sample post paid, and make them a business proposition. Write at once. Secure your territory. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

"THAT NOBLE ANIMAL, THE HORSE." YOU WANT IT.

THE GREATEST and BEST BOOK EVER WRITTEN on HORSES.

A Gold Mine of Interest and Information by Which You Save Dollars.

Prof. Oscar Gleason, the greatest horse owner, trainer and breaker that ever lived in America has at last consented to write a book on the Horse. We have made arrangement to furnish copies of this valuable work to all lovers of horses, and we call your attention to the great value of this unparalleled work which should be in every home and stable in the land. Gleason's Horse Book is a large handsomely bound book of over 400 pages, printed on pure white paper in large, clear type, bound in colored covers and richly and elegantly illustrated with 186 full plates and illustrations drawn by special artists. It is the most complete horse book ever published, produced under the direction of the United States Government Veterinary Surgeon. In this book Prof. Gleason has given to the world for the first time his wonderful methods of training and treating horses. It contains chapters on History, Education, Teaching Tricks, How to Buy, Feeding, Breeding, Breaking and Taming, How to Detect Unsoundness, Care, Complete Instructions in Proper Horse shoeing and one Invaluable Study of the Diseases and Treatment of the animal. This part alone is worth many times the value of the book and will save horse owners hundreds of dollars every year. It is a colossal compendium of facts every person ought to know who is in any way interested in horses. Nothing left out. Clear, Concise and Captivating. Order one to-day and you will never regret it; it is a whole Library on Horses in itself. Gleason's Horse Book is found in the libraries of the wealthy and has always been sold as high as $3.00 a volume until now.

SEE HOW TO GET IT. To introduce our monthly paper into homes where an interest is taken in horses we will send a copy of Prof. Gleason's Horse Book, described above, to every person who will send thirty-three cents to pay all shipping charges and for a trial six months' subscription to our paper. Great Club Premium. If you will get up a club of only two yearly subscribers to this paper at the special trial subscription price of 25 cents each we will send you the book as a free premium.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE rush for Christmas now being over, we may turn our attention to our own needs, which have been overlooked and crowded out in the grand holiday rush.

About this season of the year we find time to look over cast-off clothing with a view to remodelling. As we already have our necessary winter outfit provided, and have gotten over the holiday rush, we feel that we may take a little time for making up a fancy silk waist from soiled materials already on hand—or may make over a skirt which will be just what we need, but which will take considerable of our time, for the reason that as much work must be put into the ripping up, sponging and pressing, as in the actual making after all this has been done.

The ideas of freshening and renovation come to one only with years of experience, but when once learned the know-how remains. Velvet, when crushed can be made to rise again with the help of an open tin pan full of boiling water. Hold the wrong side over the steam, stretching it tight, and have someone else brush up the right side of the velvet with a stiff brush, brushing against the grain. This process will remove wrinkles, stiffen the crushed pile and cleanse the velvet.

White cashmere and serge may be cleaned by rubbing them with hot dry flour; brush off the flour and repeat the process if necessary. This is one of the French methods of dry cleansing.

For freshening fur, place on a table, hairy side up, and rub in handfulls of sawdust; then shake over the table, to save what sawdust shakes off. Then lay the hair side of the fur down on a pillow and beat with a switch. Continue the beating until all the sawdust has been removed. For white furs use white cornmeal in a similar manner. Remove grease from fur with gasoline applied with a piece of cloth.

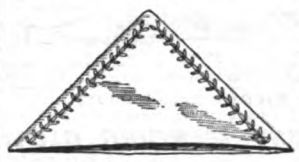
Colored and black silks are freshened by placing upon a smooth table and rubbing, by means of a cloth, with equal parts of alcohol and warm water. Don't iron silks if it can be avoided, as the heat takes out all the life. A better way is to sponge them until quite damp and then pin them tightly down onto the carpet and so leave them until thoroughly dried. Benzine will remove paint from silk, but will leave what is called a water-mark; this, however, may be removed with French chalk.



If good rubber shields are used in one's gowns, they need not be thrown away when soiled, for they will wash very well; of course the cheap ones will come out stiff, in the wash, and so are unsatisfactory; but the good ones may be washed two or three times and still be as fresh as new after each wash.

TEA-COSEY.

We give an illustration this month of a Tea-Cosey, and pattern for same. This pattern is for one quarter of the outside of the cosey, and the lining is cut exactly the same only about an inch smaller all around. Cut the outside from figured material, silk preferably, and the lining from plain silk. Line each outside portion with soft crinoline. Join the rounding edges of the lining portions, and also those of the outside, with the corresponding centers and edges even. Arrange layers of cotton batting over the wrong side of the lining, tacking it at intervals to the lining. Then slip the outside over the lining and slip-stitch them together. Tack the parts together along the seams. Trim the lower part of the cosey with a strip of plush about four inches deep and head the band with a row of cord. Sew a cord over the visible part of the seam of the outside and arrange in three loops at the center.

We have been asked for designs for small mats that are easily worked. Many beautiful designs are to be found in the shops, but nearly all are very elaborate and take much time and silk and also, in most cases, an expert needlewoman, to properly bring out the shading etc. The design we give is very simple and may be made any size desired by enlargement. The outer edge may be worked quite solid by the deep "long and short stitch," buttonholing the edge at the same time. The inner designs may be made in outline or solid, and all may be made in white, if desired. If, however, the edge is made of white silk and the hearts and diamonds are made in solid red and the clubs and spades in solid black, the effect is quite striking, and of course the mat will launder equally well, as all silks are warranted washable nowadays.

BOOK MARK.

The little three-cornered design is for a bookmark. We illustrated a similar one sometime ago, and have been asked repeatedly to show the design again. It is simply the corner of an envelope, and may be decorated according to the fancy of the maker—either with a vine or spray in water color, a conventional design in pen and ink, or a short message or motto. It is a good idea to have several of these little corners lying around on tables or desks, so that the children will get in the habit of putting one over the corner of the leaf of the book they are reading, and so grow up with the habit of keeping the corners of their books fresh and unturned. Children of a larger growth would do well to bear this in mind also.

The Century Plant in Mexico.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

UPON approaching the City of Mexico, the traveler is struck by the novel sight of great fields of huge century plants, and he naturally wonders what use the Mexicans can find for this plant that it should be so extensively grown. The explanation is, that it is from this plant that pulque is obtained; and what beer is to Germans, pulque is to Mexicans.

This plant, called maguey in Mexico, is not a century-growing plant, as might be inferred from the name commonly given it in the United States, its average life being about eleven years only. In its enormous leaves, often fifteen feet long, one foot wide and half a foot thick, it stores up its sap for ten or twelve years, and finally produces its flower and dies. This flowering is retarded by cutting out the bud of the plant, and it is in the reservoir thus formed at the base of the great leaves, that the sap collects.

Every morning the day's accumulation of sap is gathered up by the Indian laborers, it being said of this that while the finer grade is dipped up (evidently a tedious and oftentimes painful performance, the plant being armed at every point with large thorns), the ordinary kind is drawn up through a tube into the mouth of the laborer, whence he deposits it in a hog-skin sack he carries on his back.

The sap is sweet when first taken from the plant, and at that stage is called agua miel (honey water); a partial fermentation, which takes place in twenty-four hours, transforms it into pulque; and the fermentation continuing twenty-four hours later it has become swill. Many efforts have been made to discover a process whereby the fermentation may be stopped when it has reached the pulque stage, but without success so far, and this very effectually confines pulque-drinking to Mexico.

There are thirty-three varieties of the maguey growing on the elevated table-lands of Mexico, where it is native, and it is from the largest of these that pulque is obtained. Each healthy plant yields from one hundred to one hundred and fifty gallons, annually; and as the City of Mexico alone consumes fifteen hundred gallons per day, the extent to which this plant is grown may be seen. From the sap of another variety, which grows wild, the natives distil mescal and sotol, both fiery, intoxicating drinks; and from the sap of a variety which grows as far north as Santa Fe, New Mexico, the Apache Indians distil tis-wain, an intoxicating liquor that has caused more than one Apache outbreak. These Indians roast in hot ashes the leaves of yet another variety for food, they having, when cooked, much the nature of a stringy sweet potato.

The discovery of the pleasure-giving properties of the sap of the maguey led, so tradition has it, to the downfall of the Toltec Empire; and this tradition is as follows:

"In the year 1021 there reigned in Tula (the Toltec capital) a powerful Cacique whose name was Tepalcatzin; and residing at the court of this monarch was a nobleman, the Tzin Papantl, who was the father of a beautiful girl who bore the name of Xochitl, and who came to be known as 'The Flower of Tula.' Now it so happened that the Tzin Papantl discovered quite by accident that the sap of the maguey, when partially fermented, made a very palatable drink; and thinking to further his interest at court, he at once sent Xochitl bearing a vessel of the beverage to the Cacique.

"Tepalcatzin was delighted with the drink, but was charmed by the beauty of its bearer, and he persuaded her to remain in the palace and become Queen number-two. In the course of time Xochitl became the mother of a prince, who, through the favoritism of his father, afterward ascended the Toltec throne. This was considered by Queen number-one an usurpation of her own son's rights, and the family quarrel which followed at last resulted in the intervention of the war-like Aztecs, who overran the country and took it for themselves."

BIRDS sham death, as a matter of protection. A moorhen will lie in the hand perfectly limp and to all appearances unconscious. A beetle or spider will lie as if dead, with its legs all drawn in, thus hoping to be passed over. One reason suggested for this strange reasoning in these small animals is that cats never touch their prey unless it moves which seems to be understood by birds.

A solution of pearlash in water, thrown on a fire, extinguishes it instantly.

WINES FROM APPLE TREES.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

The NOTION of converting cider into sherry, madeira, hock and various other kinds of wines of first-rate quality—not by falsification, but by proper and legitimate methods—is sufficiently novel to excite serious interest. That such a transformation is practicable will be declared shortly in an official bulletin of the Department of Agriculture, which will tell American farmers how to turn their apple orchards into vineyards without vines and their cider presses into wine presses. For some-time past the government experts have been pursuing this line of research, and their efforts have finally been crowned with success.

The whole matter depends upon certain kinds of yeasts, which have been imported expressly for the purpose from France, Italy and Spain. As is well known, the fermentation of wines is caused by the presence in the grape-juice of certain species of fungi—microscopic plants related to the common "molds." Bread yeast, which makes the dough rise, is composed of such fungi which feed upon the flour and cause it to ferment. In the same way the grape yeasts feed upon the grape-juice and bring about its fermentation, thus transforming it into wine.

Now, the fungi of the wine yeasts live ordinarily in the soil of the wine-producing districts. There are ever so many species of them, and their minute "spores," which correspond to seeds, float about in the air, thus getting upon the fruit and so into the vats in which the grape-juice has been collected. Finding thus the food they like, they multiply by billions in the fluid, and in this manner their wine-making errand is accomplished.

However, the various species differ very much in the effects which they produce upon the grape-juice. The wine will be more or less delicate in flavor, according to the kinds of yeast-fungi that gets into the raw material. Until recently this fact has not been understood, and so wine-production hitherto has been more or less of a gamble, the most skillful vineyardist being unable to tell in advance how a given batch of his output would turn out.

But now it is different. Science, having managed to identify the good yeast-plants, has succeeded in separating them out and propagating them artificially on gelatine in glass tubes. In this shape—the tubes tightly corked with wads of cotton to prevent the intrusion of other microbes—they have been brought from Europe to the United States, and it is a matter of no difficulty to breed unlimited quantities of them from this stock.

Enclosed in the plugged tube, a colony of the precious fungi forms a whitish patch on the surface of the semi-fluid gelatine inside. It is only with the aid of a powerful microscope that the little plants can be distinguished as individuals. When wanted for business, a few of them are introduced into a vat of newly-collected grape-juice, and immediately they begin to multiply in such numbers as actually to crowd out all other species of yeasts. Consequently the fermentation goes ahead ideally, and the resulting wine is of a definite flavor, "bouquet," sweetness, and richness in alcohol, all of these qualities being determined in advance.

Now, the spontaneous fermentation of apple-juice is due, similarly, to microscopic fungi which are carried by air, deposited upon the fruit, and so transferred to the cider vats. Here again ever so many species are concerned, and some are much less beneficial than others. Even under the microscope, they look much alike, and yet the effects they produce upon the apple-juice in which they propagate are widely different. This, indeed, explains the notable variations in the quality of cider, such as every one has noticed. According to the sort of yeast that predominates in the apple-juice, the cider will be more or less rich in alcohol, more or less sweet, more or less delicate as to flavor, and possessed of more or less keeping quality.

So it will be seen that whatever is true of grape-juice in this regard is true also of apple-juice, and the only way to be sure of getting first-rate cider every time is to control the yeast fungi which develop in it. This can be done perfectly well, and will be accomplished as soon as farmers can be persuaded to take the trouble to keep on hand a little bottle of the proper microbes, which before long will be on the market, just as bacteria for ripening cream are already sold to dairymen.

Some of the beneficent cider-making fungi have already been identified and propagated. Just as in the case of the grape-juice, a few of them, introduced into the vat of fresh apple-juice, quickly established for themselves a monopoly there, preventing any "wild" species from developing. The cider, not affording nourishment to any trouble-making microbes, clears rapidly, is rich in alcohol, and acquires the desired flavor and bouquet. In the not-distant future, as a result of intelligent effect on the part of apple-growers, we shall have in this country special brands of cider of an excellence hitherto undreamed of.

However, this is not all, by any means. It remains to speak of the conversion of cider into wines, which is a matter of far more importance commercially. And, in discussing this point, it must be realized at the start that grape-juice is only a raw material to which the fungi contribute the qualities of flavor, bouquet, etc., which give it value. Such being the case, it is not so very astonishing to find that apple-juice will do just about as well as grape-juice to make fine wines out of. In fact, it is discovered that, in order to produce excellent sherry, it is necessary merely to add to apple-juice the proper yeast, obtained originally from the Xeres district in Spain. The same way with Madeira, with port, and so on.

This is what the experts of the Department of Agriculture have been working on recently, and the results they have obtained are really wonderful. One of them showed to the writer yesterday a series of large bottles, from which in succession he poured hock, madeira, sherry, port, and three or four other wines—all of them made from the same batch of apple-juice, but resembling each other in not the slightest degree, while it would hardly have been possible for an experienced wine-taster to distinguish them from the articles which they counterfeited.

The United States, of course, is the great apple-producing country, and this new discovery opens out a prospect for an immense and very profitable industry for American farmers. They will become wine-makers, without planting a vine, and will supply the markets of both the Old World and the new with Yankee "vintages" comparable to the best European. Very little skill will be required in the business—the yeast-plants, bought in bottles, will attend to that—and the apple wines will have the additional advantage of superior purity, inasmuch as they will be so cheap that it will not pay to adulterate them.

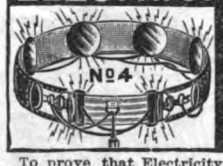
In conclusion, it may be of interest to state that the fungi in the grape-juice or apple-juice feed upon the sugar which the stuff contains. This sugar they transform into alcohol and carbonic acid gas. By the introduction of the requisite species of microbes, apple-juice is converted into champagne, to which the requisite "fizz" is given by forcing an extra supply of carbonic gas into it. It is mighty good champagne, too—a real wine, and not to be confused for a moment with the "champagne cider" so long familiar.

WHERE IRON IS SCARCE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

We are told by historians that the overthrow of the Aztec empire by Cortez was due largely to the fact that the Aztecs were not possessed of either iron or steel weapons with which to combat the Spaniards, iron being then unknown in Mexico.

This is true, no doubt, and iron is still a scarce commodity in Mexico, so scarce that a pilfering Mexican will walk ten miles to steal a handful of railroad spikes, and the losses of Mexican railroads by thefts of this kind amount to an important sum every year. Spikes, bolts, tools, in fact any article of iron that is not spiked down, locked up, or too heavy to be carried away, will quickly disappear if left unguarded. These losses have been reduced to a minimum, however, the railroads having learned by sad experience how to protect themselves, and if the traveler in Mexico will observe closely, he will note that the trainmen carefully remove the coupling links and pins from cars that are left on side-tracks, and that the point of every bolt in the track is battered so that the tap cannot be removed with the fingers.



On one occasion, so the railroaders relate, the men composing a freight-train crew were all called to the forward end of their train; in their haste, they neglected to lock their caboose, and when they returned to it, after a short absence they found that their stove, in which they had left a roaring fire, had been stolen.

Again, it is said that the engineer and fireman of a train that was standing on a lonely side-track awaiting the coming of another train, decided to avail themselves of the opportunity for a nap. They slept not longer than thirty minutes, but when they awoke, they found it impossible to move their engine, thieves having stolen vital parts of the machinery.

Another story is, that a pile-driver met with an accident, and its hammer which weighed a ton or more falling to the ground, was left where it had fallen until a crane could be brought to return it to its place. A Mexican spied it lying there, a prize of untold value in his eyes, and he called in a party of his friends to assist him in carrying it off.

The hammer was heavy, they well knew, but give a Mexican a burro (donkey) and unlimited time, both of which are usually plentiful in Mexico, and he will dare to undertake almost anything; therefore a burro became one of the party that stole noiselessly that night along the railroad track. Arriving at the hammer, two timbers taken from a bridge near-by were placed, one end on the ground, the other on the burro's back, making an incline up which the men began sliding their prize. Up, up it went, inch by inch until it was almost on the burro's back, when, with a groan, the patient little animal gave way and sank to the ground, the ponderous hammer falling on him and crushing out his life.

Dollars for Pennies.
"THE LIGHT THAT WON'T GO OUT."

Every family in America is ready to buy "The light that sells on sight"—the wonderful new invention called ARC-LIGHT WICK.

It burns a whole year without trimming. It kills a candle, discounts kerosene, beats gas, and almost equals electricity or sunlight.

It saves 20 per cent. of oil. It's clear, white and brilliant. It's the light that won't go out. It's the light in the window for thee.

The Light That Sells On Sight.

The ARC-LIGHT is something new. All need it, all buy it, all bless it. To show it means to sell it, and it yields from 100 per cent. to 300 per cent. profit to agents.

The same kind of carbon that gives the electric light its brilliancy is woven into the Arc-Light by a patent process. We hold affidavit showing that an Arc-Light burned 1040 hours, giving the last hour the same perfect, brilliant, light it gave the first.

A single lamp manufacturer in New England, who bought over 35,000 writes: "The Arc-Light beats all others. It sells our lamps, and turns night into day." Every home, store, hotel, saloon, hall, church, or car company will buy the Arc-Light Wick on sight. We have made arrangements with the manufacturers to introduce this wonderful discovery, and we offer for 60 days the following wholesale terms to agents:

Medium or A wick, 5-8 inch wide—the size for house lamps—by mail, sample 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $2.50. Small or E wicks, for hand lamps, lanterns, etc., 3-8 inch wide, sample, 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $2.50. Large or B wicks, for table, bracket lamps, 1 inch wide, hall, store, or sample, 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $3.50. Dwick, 11-2 inches wide, for incubators, hall, bracket, or store lamps, sample, 8 cents; 33 cents dozen; $3.50 gross. Argand wicks for parlor lamps, sample wick, 8 cents; per dozen, 33 cents; per gross, $3.50. On all orders for $10.00 accompanied by the cash, 15 per cent. off. Send for sample dozen, giving width desired, and see how they go. We can supply you with any style ARC-LIGHT WICK in any quantities, from a single wick to a thousand dozen.

BEEF ISSUE DAY.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

FOR MANY years the various tribes of American Indians, not self-supporting, received rations at regular and stated times from the United States Government. It was customary to distribute the meat upon a certain day of one week, and upon the same day of the following week, the other rations; in each case the quantity issued was expected to last for two weeks. The general supplies were cereals, lard, tea, coffee, sugar, salt, etc., dealt out in accordance with the size of each family; the beef was supplied "on the hoof," instead of "from the block" as is the present custom.

During the time that the Cherokee Commission was negotiating with the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians, the Commissioners with members of their families were stationed for months at Fort Reno, Indian Territory. The encampments of those Indians were close at hand, and there was a fine opportunity to learn something of life among the untamed barbarians.

Beef Issue was a time of great excitement to the Indians, to which they looked forward with eager longing, while to the civilized it was a harrowing spectacle never willingly witnessed a second time, unless by those who were destitute of the attributes of pity and mercy. The sight was one of the most revolting exhibitions of cruelty to animals ever tolerated in a Christian land, and doubly shocking because sanctioned by the government, as represented by the Indian Department, the horrible butchery being conducted under the eyes of government officials.

One autumn morning at an early hour, a party left Fort Reno for a certain point four miles distant, where the beef was to be distributed that day to the Indians of this especial reservation. The party included the Commissioners with their wives, the Indian Agent, a United States Army officer, detailed to inspect the cattle and superintend the work, and a small detachment of troops. Passing the shabby but picturesque tepees of the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians, clustered at desirable points on the rolling prairie, it was evident that unusual activity prevailed. As the little procession from the fort drew near the designated place, the Indians could be seen approaching from different directions, hastening towards a large, rudely constructed corral, where more than one hundred wild Texan steers were confined. The older men either came walking through the tall grass that partially concealed them, or else two or three would be astride of a small pony, as they have no mercy upon any beast. All of these were blanketed Indians, only just ready to receive gifts from the government, but not ready to adopt any garments suggesting civilization. All wore moccasins, were enveloped in white cotton blankets, long hair braided, with the scalp lock decorated with feathers.

As this pastime was furnished by the Indian Department as a slight compensation for the loss of pleasure and profit consequent upon the disappearance of the buffalo, the young "bucks" who were to take an active part in the "hunt," came mounted upon their ponies. One hundred of these braves, ready for the fray, were drawn up in line near the corral, awaiting the first act in the tragedy of the day.

In one corner of the inclosure we saw the scales for weighing the animals and the branding chute. It was the duty of the Indian agent and the army officer to inspect the cattle, when those that were accepted were weighed in their presence. With great difficulty the poor dumb creatures were driven into the branding chute, where they were packed as closely as possible. All of them seemed wild with fear, but the worst was yet to come. The branders stood ready with heated irons and watched their opportunity to quickly press the red hot metal upon the back or flank of each struggling creature, when his frantic plunge and roar of pain only increased the enjoyment of his savage tormenters. In the writhings and turnings to escape, one occasionally stumbled or the long, curved horns became locked, each miserable condition being welcomed with shouts of joy by "the wards of our government" who with great glee continued to prod the animals with sharp irons. The reason given for the branding is, that the letters "I. D." are necessary for the protection of the Indian in whose possession a hide is found, proving that it became his through the generosity of the Indian Department.

The mounted Indians were near the chute, and when this part of the work ended, one by one their names were called. Each one designated came forward and marked his property by cutting off its tail or an ear, or possibly by a dextrous stroke struck a horn down to the quick, or applied an additional brand. Sometimes the more humane plan was adopted of tying a strip of cloth to the creature. When all were labelled, the gate was opened; with blows and shouts the maddened animals were turned loose upon the prairie, only to confront new dangers as they strove to escape from the brutal crowd.

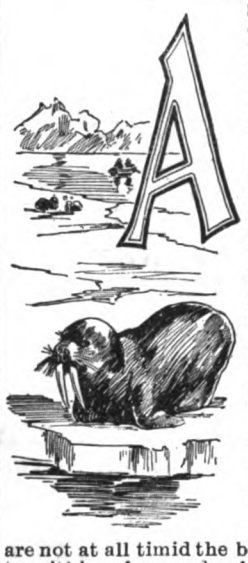
As soon as a "buck" recognized his property, he broke from the ranks, urged his pony to its highest speed and chased the frenzied steer, occasionally firing his Winchester rifle. Many shots were fired at random; as it is a pleaure to prolong this mimic buffalo chase, the aim is not to kill, but to produce agony. From time to time the gate was opened and other steers rushed out, until the prairie seemed literally alive with the frightened beasts and the racing, yelling Indians. At last one totters, falls, tries to rise, but after a few useless efforts sinks exhausted, struggling and bellowing until its owner is pleased to fire the finishing shot. But the height of cruelty was not reached until the brave sprang from his pony, seized the dying creature, cut out its tongue, hung it to his saddle bow and rode proudly to the spot where the older Indians waited to show his trophy of the exciting hunt.

The whole scene was fantastic and uncanny; the Indians in ghostly wrappings, their long black hair unbraided in their race was streaming over face and shoulders, the eagle feathers dangling from each scalp lock, as with Winchesters held high, uttering hideous yells and whoops they spurred their nimble footed ponies to circle round and round the flying, terrified beasts. It was a spectacle to fill one with disgust and horror; the exhibition was a stain upon the starry field of our nation's flag and a scathing commentary upon our boasted civilization of the nineteenth century.

The wife of one of the Commissioners could not restrain her tears at the shocking brutality and expressed to the agent in very plain language her opinion of the demoralizing effect of such practices, and the disgrace reflected upon a government that permitted such barbarity. The agent was disturbed at her criticism but could only say as an excuse—"It pleases the Indians."

As soon as the butchery was over the squaws gathered like vultures, for to their care the dead cattle are intrusted. They fell at once to work, and while the flesh was still quivering with life, fevered from the wild dash for liberty, the creatures were skinned, the carcasses cut up, loaded upon wagons and drawn to the tepees. One beef was apportioned to eleven persons, the squaws being strictly honest in the distribution. Every portion is utilized but the eyes and horns and the portions usually classed as offal were used in a way disgusting and shocking to civilized beings. For five full days contentment abided in the tepees. Nothing but meat was eaten until the supply was exhausted; then they reluctantly turned their attention to the other rations, as they waited for another Beef Issue, their regularly recurring holiday.

There were Government Schools and devoted missionaries at work upon this same reservation, and one could but reflect that much of the good they might have done was counteracted by the fiendish influence of such brutal scenes at regular and stated intervals.



Upon some of the reservations there were serious difficulties to overcome before this method could be changed. There was often a lack of water and suitable drainage, while in other cases, the Indians were restive, liked the way that they had been accustomed to receive their beef, did not care for a change, and it was very easy for the agent to oblige them, without running the risk of serious discontent.

In a majority of cases these objections have been overcome, and the baneful practice is discontinued. This has been accomplished in the last four years, and soon, it is hoped, "beef on the hoof" will be a thing of the past; then supplies will be "from the block" under proper sanitary regulations.

The life of the Indian is no longer made luxurious in accord with his savage ideas, and he views the possibility of becoming like the white man with far more interest than a decade ago, when the government supplies all of his wants with a lavish hand, possibly regarding his needs from the standpoint of our higher civilization. He is now learning the richest lesson of his life, the value of labor; when that is achieved and he ceases to be a dependent idler, the long-debated Indian question will be practically settled.

WALRUS HUNTING.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

A SPORT that our Arctic explorers and other visitors to the Arctic Ocean have found highly exciting as well as rather dangerous, is that of walrus hunting. Though the walrus on the ice is a clumsy, awkward creature, he is quite the reverse while in the water, as numerous tales of the Esquimaux and others who have had encounters with them will testify. When the Esquimaux, who are of course famous walrus hunters go after their prey, they approach them in boats until near enough for the harpoon to be thrown—the nearer the better. The creatures are usually found on the ice-floes, and as they are not at all timid the boat can sometimes get to within a few yards of them before the blow is delivered.

The harpoon used is a wicked affair. To its head is attached a very long and tremendously strong line of whale-skin, while the handle is loose and easily separated from the head. When the harpoon is thrown the head penetrates the thick skin, while the handle comes off and floats in the water. The line is attached to the head in such a way that instead of pulling out when the line is taut, it turns at right angles to the wound; so that it is impossible for the walrus to get away unless the line breaks. This way and that the walrus swims, towing the boat here and there with frightful speed, its occupants in danger of being dashed against an icefloe, or of being overturned and drowned. At last, however, if everything goes well, the poor beast is tired out and a lance thrust or bullet in a vital part puts it out of suffering. Then he is towed back to shore and cut up.

Accidents frequently happen; the walrus sometimes turns on his captors and many a kayak, as the Esquimaux boats are called, has been overturned or destroyed and the occupants either drowned or killed by the infuriated beasts.

It is possible to shoot walruses, of course, but unless the shot kills the creature instantly there is great danger that he will get into the water and sink.

The cry of these animals is a deep groan or bark, and the Esquimaux are very clever in imitating this cry and often succeed in attracting the creatures to their boat when they are not in sight on the ice.

The walrus grows frequently to a weight of twenty-five hundred pounds, and does not look unlike an overgrown hog with the exception of its huge flippers, bristles, whiskers and long ivory tusks. Its skin is very thick, and is wrinkled and warty, and covered with a sparse growth of reddish or grey hair. The size of its head is out of all proportion to the size of its body.

On land a more ungainly object would be hard to find, but in the water it is indeed a worthy foeman.

HOW NEWS IS GATHERED.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

PEOPLE pick up the daily paper, read it through with more or less care, according to their time and inclination, and throw it aside. Of the same edition one man may say, "It's very strange how little there really is in the paper," while another will remark, as he lays it down, "What a remarkable collection of material to be provided us for so small a sum."

But of all the millions who read the paper, however, it is strange how few ever stop to think of the amount of labor required to produce what they buy for almost nothing, read, and toss aside; or, of the methods employed for bringing all this material together.

It would be far beyond the limit of a single article to do justice to the subject of news gathering, and I shall write merely of some of the more generally employed methods of which, however, I imagine most people are as ignorant as I was myself until I went into a newspaper office to work.

So far as I had any idea, up to that time, of the methods employed for collecting the news which was to be printed in the paper, I think it was that each paper had a large force of reporters who were turned loose on the world each morning, to wander about until they chanced to run across some happening of sufficient importance to make it of interest to the general public. Of the systematic way in which the work is carried on I had no idea, nor, I am inclined to believe, have people in general. Of course individual systems in different offices vary, but the general principle is about the same everywhere.

First there are the great news associations, more or less wide spread, with their reporters scattered almost everywhere. The representative of a news association in any town reports any important event which occurs within his territory, and a brief summary of his report is telegraphed all over the country, to the papers connected with that association. In some places there will be local associations doing similar work on a smaller scale. In many cities there will be what are known as "accident notification bureaus," or "fire notification companies." These make it their business to telephone the earliest possible notice of an accident, arrest, or fire to the offices of all the papers in that city which have agreed to pay them for doing so. In one city I know a young man who makes a good living by furnishing the papers of the city lists of names of the arrivals at all of the leading hotels in the city. He makes a certain number of trips to each hotel every day, copies the names from the registers and then supplies quickly-made manifold copies to such papers as subscribe for his service. It costs the papers only a dollar or two a week, and yet he makes good wages.

Almost all of the larger papers utilize these channels for obtaining material. In very many cases the accounts sent in by these associations are as full as are desired. In others the information received in this way serves merely as a hint to an editor who has a keen news instinct. He sees in it the possibility for a more or less interesting "story," and the reporter on his force at liberty at the time, whom he thinks best fitted to deal with that particular line of work, is assigned to follow it up.

The word "story" is used in newspaper offices with a peculiar signification, and the new man who has associated with the word only the idea of a piece of fiction, in which a more or less intricate plot is dressed up in attractive language, is surprised to be sent out to get a half column "story" about such prosaic matters as the proceedings of the Board of Trade at a meeting held to consider the subject of rates of fire insurance.

Most well-regulated newspaper offices have an assignment box. This is a case divided into compartments numbered to correspond with the days of the month.

To each paper the mail of every day brings a considerable number of announcements of coming events, programs, tickets, and invitations. These are carefully assorted into their appropriate compartments in the box. Verbal announcements are written down and cared for likewise. Often information comes in the form of a mere hint, of which at the time only a memorandum can be made; and the success of an editor depends very largely upon the wideness of this circle of personal acquaintances on whom he can draw in this way, and on the quickness which he possesses to perceive the real value of any hint which may be given. Along with all the rest of this material there goes into the box innumerable items concerning matters of future interest, clipped each day from the papers of that day, by a man whose business it is to go through the exchanges with a pair of shears, looking out for just this kind of material.

Then, each day, the space in the box devoted to the next day is emptied and the contents carefully sorted over by the editor. Some things will have lost their interest, even in the short time they have been lying there. Others are of too little value to require attention. Still others can be left to the reports which will be sent in by the news associations. There remains the small residue which the editor considers of sufficient importance for his paper to justify his sending out special reporters. If an assignment is for morning or early forenoon it is usually given out the night before, otherwise not until the next day. Such information as may have been collected on that special matter is put into the hands of the reporter for his assistance, and the editor is usually able to add a few words of personal suggestion or advice, often of the greatest value.

Usually one reporter during the day, and another at night, has for his exclusive and regular work the watching of the police headquarters. In most cities it is the rule that the record book is kept at police headquarters in which is supposed to be entered a brief report of any arrest which is made or any accident reported, directly after the police themselves have the information. The reporter decides for himself, or the city editor decides for him, if the matter is of sufficient importance for the reporter to work it up.

In addition to its other branches for news-getting every large paper has its own corps of correspondents, scattered all over the country, who are expected to be on the watch for any important event in their territory. In the larger cities these will be men who give their whole time to the work. In the smaller cities and towns they are generally men connected with local newspaper work, often the editor of the local paper. It is not left to them to decide what and how much material they shall telegraph in, for they would be apt to overestimate public interest in what seems of great importance to them, and send in a longer account than the real value of the story would justify.

The method employed is this. Early each evening, the correspondent, if anything has happened in his territory that day, such as a fire, or an accident, wires to the newspaper office what is called a bulletin of it. This is the gist of the story compressed into the fewest possible words, and the correspondent indicates at the end what he thinks would be a fair length as, "$10,000 fire John Smith fireman broken back 20 hogs burned 100 words."

The night editor considers all these bulletins as they come in, decides which are essential, and wires back an order for the article, if he wishes it, varying the number of words to be sent as he thinks advisable. All large newspaper offices have a sufficient number of telegraph instruments operated by the large companies directly in the newspaper office now, so that all this wiring back and forth consumes little time, and the story finally comes in from the correspondent in ample time for the early edition.

The "grave yard" of a newspaper office has been so often written of that almost every one knows how, in every well-managed office, all the papers of each day are carefully gone over, and from them clipped every item which gives any information in regard to any person who is prominent, or has any chance of becoming so.

These clippings are systematically filed, and become available for obituary notices or biographical articles whenever they are called for. A quiet tip, given to an editor by a friendly physician, that he has been called to prescribe for the Hon. Mr. Blank and found him seriously ill, sends a force of men skurrying to the "grave yard" for the envelope containing the clippings pertaining to that man. These clippings are scissored, pasted, and connected into a lengthy obituary notice. This is sent upstairs to be set in type, marked "hold for orders," until the telephone bell rings the announcement of the death of this man when a hurriedly prepared extra gives an account of his life and death to the street.

The amount of time and labor put into these collections is very great, and it is said that the "grave yard" of the New York Herald is insured for $250,000.

It may not be generally known, however, that a well-arranged "grave yard" contains much more than a collection of articles pertaining merely to people. Famous buildings go in there, with the chance that they may sometime be burned, or celebrate an anniversary, in either of which cases their history becomes of interest. Accounts of floods and accidents are valuable for purposes of comparison. The scope of the collection is limited only by the room at the disposal of the office or by the amount of force which can be assigned to doing the work.

Tobacco Raising in the United States.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

WHEN the white men first came to America, they discovered among other things the tobacco plant. The Indians raised enough tobacco for their own use, and the habit of smoking was taken up by the Europeans at once. Sir Walter Raleigh introduced tobacco, together with the perhaps more useful potato, into England.

When the colonists settled Virginia, tobacco became the favorite crop, in fact it was so easy to raise and so profitable to sell that it was found necessary, to prevent a famine, to pass laws requiring the planters to raise a certain amount of maize for each acre of tobacco planted. Every ship that sailed to the mother country carried large cargoes of

ALMOST MIRACULOUS.

Facts That Are Stranger Than Fiction.

The wonderful results that have blessed the work of the Christian Scientists at the end of the nineteenth century, seem almost miraculous to the ordinary layman who has not seriously considered their methods, or who perhaps has forgotten that in the inspired word all things are promised to those who ask and that those who ask shall find.

While the Christian Scientists of modern times make no claim of ability to work miracles or to raise the dead, it is an incontestable fact that through the knowledge of the superiority of mind over matter and the skill acquired by years of study of the lessons taught by the great intellects of all ages, the most wonderful results have been achieved in the cure of the physical ailments of distressed humanity. No disease has been proof against this treatment and no case of human suffering has failed to secure relief even when the sufferer has been without belief in Christian Science and has had no personal knowledge of or contact with the Healer.

Notable among the most successful of the Christian Science Healers of today is S. A. Jefferson, Chicago, Ill., who is blessed by the grateful prayers of hundreds if not thousands of those who have been restored to health by intelligent application of the methods of Christian Science. To those who are suffering and who desire to test the beneficent results of this treatment; bearing in mind that distance and unbelief in the theory of Christian Science make no difference; a little book called "A Message of Health" and giving detailed information regarding this blessed truth, will be sent on application and receipt of a 2 cent stamp by S. A. JEFFERSON, Room 39, Fairbanks Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

HYPNOTISM

DOES IT PAY? FREE!

That is the chief question for the practical reader. Everybody admits that it is an interesting and wonderful science. It is the only science existing that penetrates to the hidden and inscrutable recesses of thought. Its grasp is on the MIND as that of the physical sciences is on MATTER. It deals with the unseen, the intangible, the mysterious. But, you ask, does it pay to learn it? Does it pay to know it? Does it pay to acquire its methods and practice it as an art or calling? I at once answer you, yes, emphatically, YES. Just apply to it the same tests that you would to any other business, craft or calling. Why do you study any of them? Is it not to earn a living, to provide for your family, to secure an independence, to obtain friends, distinction and happiness for yourself and your loved ones? It certainly is; these are the objects in life that men strive and toil for, and I tell you that Hypnotism offers a surer and speedier way to obtain them than any other means open to the rising generation. This is true, and I will give you the best proof of it. I will give you for the asking a copy of MY FREE BOOK, which is entitled, a "Key to the Mysteries of Hypnotism," but is likewise a triumphant answer to the question, "Does it pay?" This is a book of elegant appearance, richly illustrated on every page, and is certainly the nicest book ever given away free in the interests of science. It cost me much time, labor and money, but it will cost you nothing whatever but the trouble of writing for it, even on a postal card, if need be. As the title implies, my book tells you all about Hypnotism, its history, development, methods, phenomena and uses, but flashing out of every line you will also learn the secret of how it pays. In the first place, it is easy and quick to learn, easier than any other study which forms the basis of a livilihood or profession. Anybody who can merely read can master it quickly, and then will never forget it. Surely that is a paying feature to the youth starting out in life, to the bread-winner who desires a change for the better, or anybody needing an honorable and lucrative profession. Compare it, if you like, with the years spent in college to learn law or medicine, or the years of apprenticeship to a trade or busisess. But Hypnotism also PAYS PROMPTLY in this one grand feature, it gives you control of other minds and direction of their wills. You may not at once see what that amounts to. Send for and read my book, FREE, and you will find that this mental dominion is a passport to social favor, to public reputation, to advancement in position, and to the highest success in business. Control of other minds is not only thus a fortune-winner, but my book will show you how it works to banish pain, to cure every known disease or bad habit, to correct either moral or intellectual frailty, to win ardent love and devoted friendship, to benefit, to bless and to entertain all around you, not only for instant gain, but for a continuance of health, prosperity and happiness. Now, if I prove all this, won't you admit that IT PAYS? Well, my book proves it. It costs you nothing to get it. It is a master-key to all the treasure vaults of life. Write for it this very hour, and learn the knowledge that all this world's a-seeking. IT IS FREE. Address, Prof. L. A. HARRADEN, Jackson, Michigan.

ALL MEN AND BOYS

require a good knife that has not only got the right stuff in it but it must be strong and be large enough for all round service. The detachable and adjustable knife here illustrated is made in Sweden. This knife is made from the finest hand forged razor steel, it is very strong and made in the very best manner. It is not only an every day Pocket knife but for hunting and purposes where strength and utility is wanted it makes the most satisfactory and desirable knife in existence. The small illustration showing knife in the hand gives an idea of the open ready for use knife; the large illustration shows the brass frame which the blade shuts into before it all slides into the strongly made handle marked "Sweden." The Swedes are the most honest and thorough workmen in the world and Swedish Razors have a world wide reputation. These knives are now having a large sale in America on account of their great strength, durability and keen edge. The handle is four inches long and blade and handle together seven inches long.

A KNIFE FREE. These knives sell in many places for $1.00 but we will give one free to any one sending us two yearly subscribers at 25c each or send 50c for a two years' subscription.

WE GIVE THIS WATCH FOR A CLUB OF 4.

Thirty Minutes is a short time, but many have earned one of these watches in less time than that. It is one of the very best watches for time ever offered to our readers at no matter what the price asked for it. We know, of course, there are watches that cost more money, because they are in gold or silver cases, but they will not keep any better time, simply because they cannot. This watch keeps not perfect time, we never saw the watch that did, but it keeps as near perfect time as watches usually do. We have such faith in this watch as a timekeeper that we send with every one a guarantee just as binding as that given with any watch, no matter what make. We are willing to give you this watch if you will do us a slight service, which you can easily do in an hour. We wish to increase our subscription list, and we want the assistance of every reader of this paper to that end. We do not want you to do it for nothing, we will reward you for it. You can easily secure this valuable watch if you get four subscribers to this paper, at our special subscription price of 25 cents a year each. Do this, sending us $1.00, with the names of four subscribers to this paper, and we will send our paper to each subscriber for one year, and we will send you the watch to reward you for your efforts in our behalf. Start out now and see what you can do. Remember we guarantee every watch. If you get five subscribers and send us $1.25 for the same we will also send you a nice chain. TALKS WITH GIRLS.

CONDUCTED BY COUSIN MARION.

A Happy New Year to you, dears, and all the good of another century, brought down into the few short years that the good Lord gives to us. May it be not only a happy New Year, but every day of it happier than its predecessor. Now let us to our task.

The first inquirer is Forest Fern, Felt Mills, N. Y., who wants to know as so many of my cousins do, about permitting familiarities from young men. All I can say to her and to all, now and always is, "For Heaven's sake, don't." Why do you want to make yourself cheap and common?

Innocent, Richardson, Tenn.—Get the young man out of your thoughts until you are twenty-one. Time enough then to worry.

Marie Louise, Hallowdale, Miss.—Accept nothing but the most formal attention from any married man. (2) It is against the law in most states to marry a first cousin. (3) Parents cannot legally prevent children who are of age from marrying.

M. P. C., Clark's Mills, N. Y.—Write to McGibbon & Co., 19th St., B'd'way, New York.

Ignorance, Magnolia, Miss.—Thanksgiving Day originated in New England, and was simply a day set apart for thanks after the harvests were all in.

Rose Lily, Saguache, Cal.—Don't "accept a man's company" until you know him very well. (2) There is everything in "how a young lady carries herself in company with young men," and she cannot be too careful. (3) It is highly inproper for a young lady to smoke cigarettes anywhere.

Rosile, Portland, Ore.—Write to Superintendent Census, Washington, D. C.

Gladys, North Town, Minn. A general acceptance of a young man's company for an evening ought to mean that he has first claim on you.

Pauline, Albany, Ga.—The eighteen year old boy may think and say that he loves you, but make him wait till he is at least of age. If he won't wait he doesn't love you at all.

Miss Pattie, Duval, Fla.—You have acted foolishly and should write to the young man saying so, and apologizing.

Alma, Campbellsburg, Ky.— Rich men looking for beautiful young girls to adopt as their daughters are very scarce. I do not know the address of a single one.

Lilac, Milwaukee, Wis. Yes, wear your hair in a braid and don't worry about your size. Precious articles are put up in small packages.

H. W. C., Washington, D. C.—Your system is run down and you need a tonic. Consult your physician. (2) The man orders the supper after the theater under the lady's direction. (3) Ask your druggist.

D. J., Croton, N. Y.—It is the lady's place to speak first. (2) A boy of seventeen may walk home from church with you if he is a nice boy.

S. R. S., Moore's Mills, N. Y.—Write to the postmaster at Albany for the information you wish, enclosing stamp for reply.

Rose, Enfield, Ills.—All wedding arrangements are made after consultation between both parties. The young lady may and should visit the home of the parents of the man she is to marry.

M. T., Irvine, Ky.—See advertisement in COMFORT for the books you want.

Brunette, Leiter's Ford, Ind.—It is hardly the right thing to refuse to dance, unless you are there as a spectator, or as chaperone.

Daisy, Sprague, Wis.—The right kind of a girl will not want to flirt with one man when she is engaged to another.

Beryl, Essex, Ont.—A visit to Europe is worth more to you than a trip through the States, expense and history considered. (2) Always dress simply. (3) Don't hide your love for the young man, if he loves you and tells you so.

Tom Girls, Burlington, Me.—As a rule it is safe to let your parents judge of a young man's fitness to be your associate. (2) Have nothing to do with one man who backbites another. (3) The young man has a right to say you must not write to other men. (4) From five to ten years is a good difference in the age of man and wife.

Bicycle Girl, Bee, Ark.—There is no harm in taking your wheel when you go to visit friends, nor in giving your picture to a young man—if he is your kinsman.

Fern, Paducah, Ky.—A bride should wear gloves. (2) Certainly, a lady should thank a man for helping her off a car.

P. and J., Worcester, Mass.—There is no way of compelling a rejected correspondent to return your letters. (2) Don't accept presents from men if you are afraid they will presume upon them. (3) Politeness only occasionally compels you to go with a man you do not like.

Correspondent, Weatherford, Tex.—There is no place in the wide world where you can sell stories, poems, &c., and have them printed and paid for at once. Editors always do just as they please with such.

Lily Polly, Brownfield, Ills.—It is not elegant for a man to smoke in a lady's company, and positively bad form for him to smoke on the street with her.

G. B., Stockbridge, Wis.—You could not do better than learn photography and practice it as a profession.

D. H. B., Ralph, Ky.—Marry the man if you love him, and don't if you don't. (2) Ask your druggist for an insectifuge.

Iona Linden, Chicago, Ills.—Study your grammar and forget for five years that there is a young man in the world.

E. K., Taos, Mo.—Stop corresponding with the young man if he is serious and you are not. (2) The whole is warm blooded.

Eva Van, Castle Leo, Cal.—As far as I can judge, I should say you might safely accept the young man. It is all right to walk three miles to church with him if there is no conveyance.

Untorown, Union Mills, Pa.—You can get a glass stopper out of a bottle by running a red hot poker carefully around the bottle neck. (2) Write to COMFORT for the song.

Dewdrop, Mt. Laurel Va.—The man precedes the lady going into church, unless it is her own church and he does not know where her pew is.

Violet, Columbus, Ohio.—It is extremely risky to marry a man who is sulky if he can't have his own way. Married people must divide their stubbornness.

Lorena, Trenton, N. J.—Be nice and polite to the young man and see if he will respond. But don't think too much about him.

Fannie, Vernon, Fla.—Put on long dresses when you begin to teach school. (2) Just go on despising the young man and let other people see you do it.

Deborah, Slaughter, La.—It is correct to speak to your partner in the dance.

Now your questions are all answered except some silly ones about hugging and kissing that every nice girl ought to know instinctively, and I wish you again a Happy New Year. By by till next month.

Tobacco Raising in the United States.

tobacco, and brought back the products of the old world to the colonists.

Tobacco is one of the important crops of America today, though only in recent years has the United States come to be considered a tobacco-growing country. Though the native tobacco is as good as any, it has taken the recent troubles in Cuba for us to find this out, for the Cuban crop being neglected, smokers were forced to use native tobacco, which was found very satisfactory. This is not remarkable in view of the fact that many of the so-called Havana cigars made in the United States in reality are manufactured of native tobacco.

The annual production of tobacco in the United States is close to 500,000,000 pounds, and from this the government has received in the last twenty-five years as a revenue tax, over a billion dollars ($1,000,000,000.) Though generally supposed to be a southern product, it is raised as far north as Wisconsin and Vermont. The largest amount of tobacco is grown in Pennsylvania, while over 65,000,000 pounds were raised last year, and it is also a product of the states of Vermont, Kentucky, Virginia, Illinois, Massachusetts, Florida, New York, Wisconsin, Ohio and Connecticut.

The tobacco leaf resembles in shape and size the leaf of the rubber plant. The plant requires a rich soil and plenty of moisture. In Virginia, in early colonial times, the planters would clear a new field for tobacco every two years at least, and the crops raised in this alluvial soil were remarkable for their luxuriance, and for their fine flavor when cured. At the present day, while it is impossible to change the location of the tobacco fields, fertilizers take the place of the virgin soil.

In northern localities the seeds are started under glass, and are transplanted early in the summer. They require plenty of water, and careful attention in weeding and the removal of insects, the tobacco worm especially, which will completely ruin a crop in a very short time if not carefully removed.

When the plants are full grown they are cut off at the roots with shears and hung up to dry in a shed, the sides of which are left open to secure a perfect circulation of air. In about a month's time the tobacco is properly cured. Recently a process has been invented for curing the leaf in a closed shed, by means of hot air forced in through glass. This does the work in three or four days, and is in some ways better than the old process. When the leaf has been properly cured and dried, it is allowed to season and become slightly damp again. The leaves are then stripped from the stalks, are sorted according to length and quality, and tied into handles. These are packed in cases containing 300 or 350 pounds each and are ready for shipment. In preparing the tobacco for market the greatest care has to be used, as a very slight mistake may ruin the crop. The government is conducting experiments in tobacco curing, in the hope of reaching better results in this direction than have been obtained heretofore.

As to the quality of the tobacco grown in the various states. The Pennsylvania leaf is of a peculiar texture, thick and rather gummy. This unfits it for cigar wrappers, but as a filler it is said to equal Cuban tobacco.

The Connecticut leaf is of fine texture, good for cigar wrappers and in flavor some experts declare that it surpasses the very finest foreign leaf. In Ohio the tobacco crop is comparatively new, but results have been most satisfactory. In Illinois the crop grown in the southern part is made into "plug" tobacco, that in the north produces good leaf for cigars.

In Virginia and in the Carolinas is grown the fine, light-colored tobacco that is made into cigarettes and the finer grades of smoking tobacco. In spite of the popular feeling against the cigarette, the fact remains that the finest tobacco raised is used in their manufacture. In Kentucky also, "curley" tobacco used in smoking mixtures is raised, while Louisiana furnishes the strong "perique" which forms an ingredient of all fine mixtures.

In Florida tobacco has been raised for centuries, though at one time it was abandoned for orange culture. The severe frosts during the winters of 1894 and 1895, which froze and ruined the orange crop just as it was ready for shipment, caused the growers to look for a surer crop, and tobacco was restored to favor. Experiments have lately been made there with a view to producing a leaf equal to or better than the Havana or Cuban tobacco. These experiments seem to be successful and good Florida leaf now commands a very high price.

In Vermont the crop has proven quite profitable and the leaf has been largely used in northern and western cities for making five and ten cent "Havana" cigars.

Methods of raising the crop of course differ in different states with climatic and soil conditions. Space does not permit a description of these variations, and the process of raising the tobacco plant is substantially as here set down.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE HEALING.

ONE MILLION CURED CASES.

You Can Be Cured Whether You Believe in Christian Science or Not.

Over a million cases of disease in every form are now to the credit of Christian Science Healing. Most of these were cases that the doctors had given up as "incurable." Many more were chronic maladies that had baffled their skill for years. All were cured quickly, some were cured instantly. The evidence on these facts is simply indisputable and the curing still goes on. There can be no mistake or misstatement about it. The healers and their work are in the public view. As a C. S. healer my many marvelous cures have startled the world. During the past 13 years I have healed diseases of almost every known kind and in every stage of severity. They included many surgical cases where operations were otherwise threatened. I cured cases that were far away from me, as well as those near at hand. And I tell you in like manner that wherever you may dwell, and whatever be your bodily ailment, or whether one or many physicians have failed to give you relief, if you report the case to me and so desire, you shall be cured. This is no vain or idle promise. My past success fully justifies it. You can be cured whether you believe in Christian Science or not. You can be cured whether in this city or thousands of miles away from me. In our Christian Science Healing distance is of no account; disbelief is not any hindrance; disappointments of the past only make stronger grounds for hope. All you really need is the wish to be healed.

I have just published a little book in regard to this blessed truth called, "A Message of Health and Healing." If you write to me I will gladly send you a COPY FREE. It gives many interesting facts and convincing testimonials. Enclose 2-cent stamp for postage.

C	Y	O	C
O	N	C	A

HERE is a chance to use your Brains and Win $500.00 in Gold. We want you to try and arrange these 20 jumbled letters printed in the block square to the left which properly arranged will spell the names of 3 large cities in the World, two of these cities being in the United States, the other one being a Foreign City. In making the 3 names the letters can only be used as many times as they appear and no letter can be used which does not appear. After you have found the 3 correct names you will have used every letter in the 20 exactly as many times as it appears. If you cannot find the 3 correct names but only find 2, you will receive a special prize for your trouble worth $1. If you answer this puzzle at once you will not be disappointed. Some one is going to win the money and it may be you. Anyway it does not cost you any money to try. All we ask is that should our committee award you a prize, that you will secure for us one yearly subscriber to our Handsome Illustrated Monthly Magazine, and as pay for securing this one subscriber, we will give you your choice of a valuable list of presents. This we can truthfully say is the very hardest puzzle ever advertised, so get out your Geography and look for these 3 cities. The correct names are only known to the President of this Company. The envelope containing the three names has been sealed and deposited with a leading Banking Co. in Boston, and will only be opened up the day after the contest closes. This we believe is the only honest way of conducting a contest, as everyone has an equal chance. In case more than one person succeeds in finding the three correct names we will divide the money equally. In addition to the $500.00 in gold we will give you an opportunity to Win

$5.00 A WEEK FOR LIFE FREE

WITHOUT ANY LABOR OR EXPENSE.

We are going to give to some one who has entered this contest and who complies with the conditions of obtaining for us one subscriber to our Magazine as stated above, an opportunity to Win and Secure from us without any labor or expense on their part $5.00 every week during their natural life. We mean just what we say. There is no deception and no trickery about this offer. If you are the lucky one, and we hope you are, for some one will get it, we will send the winner every week during his life $5.00, or else send $250.00 every year in advance whichever way they prefer. The full particulars will be mailed to you immediately upon receipt of your answer. We are a responsible company (Paid-up Capital $100,000) composed of honorable and well known business men in the city of Boston, who can furnish the best testimonials as to their integrity and financial standing. We want to secure a large list of subscribers to our Magazine and will leave no stone unturned to accomplish (by honorable methods only) our object. Everyone entering these two contests will receive honest treatment, and you will have the same chance whether you live in California or Massachusetts. Distance makes no difference. After you have carefully arranged the 20 jumbled letters into the 3 cities, send your answer to us at once with self-addressed stamped envelope and we will immediately write and send you full particulars how you can win $5.00 a week for life. Don't delay. Address

TRANSVAAL DIAMONDS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

IF the Transvaal were a waste of desert England and the Boers would not have found it worth while to go to war. But its wealth is of more than one kind, and perhaps its most unique possession is the diamond mines at Kimberley. These are by far the richest mines in the world and more than 98 per cent. of the diamonds of the world come from their depths.

Some years ago an adventurer in South Africa begged a night's lodging at the house of a Dutch farmer. He soon discovered that the children were using as playthings some bright pebbles which they said they had found in the garden. When the idea of their being diamonds was suggested to the farmer he took them to the nearest town and selling them was made rich for life. It was some years after, as late as 1870, that prospectors began to come through the country in search of the rich treasure held in gravel and clay of the region. From that time claims were taken up until more than three thousand were being worked within a comparatively narrow radius. In 1893 Cecil Rhodes brought about a great change in the management of all these claims and controlling so much property that the diamond market of the world is in his hands. Its capital is $19,000,000 and each year the output of the mines is worth about $25,000,000.

In the town of Kimberley is a large store house in which are kept probably a hundred million dollars worth of diamonds, and beside this much of the company's wealth is sent to London to be cut ready for use. This company is controlled by British capitalists and its store house is protected by a regiment of red-coated regulars, so this wealth is a plum of much promise to the Boers. With a single well planned raid upon this store sufficient wealth would fall into the hands of Oom Paul and his followers to hire mercenaries from all over Europe and equip them with the most modern accoutrements of war.

But how did all these precious stones come to be in the clay of Kimberley? Geologists tell us that in the early ages of the world the surface of the Transvaal was covered with a soft slaty rock containing a large amount of carbon. Then, through great cracks in the rock, came up boiling seething lava from the hot depths of the earth and, heating the slate to a white heat, the carbon was suddenly crystalized out of the rock into the clay of to-day. It is hard to believe that the shining gem and the bit of charcoal are made of identical elements but it is a fact.

The working of the mines at Kimberley is essentially different from that of any other mine in the world. In the first place the material in which the gems is held is soft and may be dug out instead of requiring blasting as in most mining. From the shaft in the middle of each mine galleries are built, one above another, and along these carts carry the earth to the surface, where it is spread out in the sun to dry. When the clay has reached a crumbly condition it is broken up and carried to a washing machine where the diamonds are separated from the fine soil by means of a water wheel which keeps the water in constant motion so that most of the fine clay is carried off and the heavier diamonds sink to the bottom. This sediment is then carefully examined and the diamonds taken from it by hand, so that none are overlooked. They are then sent to London to be cut.

Two of the Kimberley mines cover nineteen and thirty-five acres respectively and are the largest holes in the earth ever made by man. These mines have in their employ over fifteen hundred white men beside six thousand Kaffirs. It may be well seen that theft might be accomplished without difficulty if the utmost precaution were not taken. To take away a diamond worth a hundred thousand dollars would be an easy matter if the miners were allowed the freedom of the ordinary laborer. To prevent this the rules of the company are most rigid and no one would be tempted to enter its employ were it not for the exceptionally high wages paid. The Kaffirs are engaged for a term of months and during that time they are not allowed to leave the mine. Dormitories are provided for them and when they come from work at night each laborer is obliged to strip to the skin and leave his clothes behind him to be examined. Then a most thorough examination of their bodies has to be gone through, ears, nose and mouth, and even wounds being inspected for the precious stones which have in the past been found hidden therein. Each man is then given a blanket in which to wrap himself for the night. Over the sleeping sheds wire nettings are stretched to prevent the diamonds being thrown over. No man is allowed to even use ordinary money during his stay in the mine but is supplied with the company's specie. If stricken with sickness they are nursed at the company's hospital. Before he leaves the mine, at the end of his term of servitude, he is kept in the detention house for one week, stripped to the skin, and every act of his daily life is watched more closely than if he were a convict. But in spite of all these precautions many gems are stolen and the business of buying stolen diamonds is a profitable employment.

Some of the largest diamonds in the world have been taken from the Kimberley mines. A pale yellow stone weighing 225 carats was exhibited at Paris in 1889 and bought by an Eastern Prince. The Jagersfontein diamond is probably the largest known. It was found in 1894 by a Kaffir, who was loading clay into a cart. He gave it to the overseer and received a large reward. The stone is three inches long, two and one-half inches wide and one and one-half inches thick and weighs 971 carats. It is of a blue white color and in spite of a small flaw in the center is valued at $2,000,000. It is now in the possession of the pope having been given him by Oom Paul Kruger.

The Kimberley diamonds are not the rough, dull pebbles we are led to think of as an uncut diamond. They are bright and shining and after being boiled in a solution of nitric and sulphuric acid they are quite brilliant. In the store house at Kimberley are rooms in which 50,000 carats are exhibited at one time, sorted out in piles and of all shades, deep blue, pink, green, yellow and even dark brown. It is the policy of the company to allow but a small per cent. of their diamonds to be sold each year so that the price of gems is kept up and the dividends of the company are large while the amount of merchandise sold is small. Now if Boers should get possession of the storehouse or mines at Kimberley they would immediately put upon the market a large quantity of gems and the market value of diamonds would take a tremendous fall.

How To Cure RUPTURE

DEAR READER:—It gives me much pleasure and satisfaction to write this little story, for it contains a new and wonderful method of curing rupture or hernia, and places before the afflicted words of hope and tidings of great joy.

It is not my intention to use medical words or terms for the purpose of confusing those who are not familiar with them. I am sure this would not be more valuable for using those technical terms which some use, for the sole purpose of making some ignorant one believe they possess extraordinary knowledge

I am not going to describe the many ways one may become ruptured. In the many years I have treated ruptures I have been told of more than a thousand different things that caused my patients' affliction. That you are ruptured, and that I can cure you, is the purpose for which this is written, and it will surely be a blessing, coming unawares to those who follow its teachings.

There are several kinds of rupture and they are named according to their location, the most common being Scrotal, Umbilical (navel) and Femoral. They are again divided into two classes as reducible or irreducible. The reducible is one that can be returned to its proper place within the abdomen. The irreducible is one that cannot be returned. The last named is caused by going without a truss, but mostly by using some poor and ill-constructed one.

RUPTURED.

There are many people who are ruptured and don't know it. They will have at times a slight pain in the lower part of the abdomen. If they do much lifting or straining work it grows worse and will at times get so bad they think they have an attack of colic. They will take some medicine for colic, lie down, and in many cases the pain will disappear, because whatever was out returns to its natural position. But in other cases the surgeon has to be called because the rupture has become strangulated. In some cases he succeeds in reducing it, in others a surgical operation is necessary, and with others after hours of agony death only gives relief.

The best time to attend to a rupture is when it is small, perhaps in some cases no larger than an acorn. Many who have small ruptures say, "It is only a small one, does not give me any trouble, no need to bother about that."

SMALL RUPTURE DANGEROUS Let me say right here that to neglect the small rupture is one of the most terrible mistakes possible, for every minute life is in danger of immediate and painful death by strangulation, for the opening is so small that it only allows one intestine to come down. It then requires great force or pressure to move the contents and in many cases it becomes constricted which is very apt to prove fatal or require a painful surgical operation at a great cost of time and money.

HAVE YOU Perhaps you have suffered for years with rupture. If so, I have no doubt but you have tried many trusses and methods of cure, expended many dollars and always to same result—failure. Perhaps you have been told by some one or it has been spoken in your presence and you believed it because you never took time to think about it, that "rupture could not be cured."

IT CAN BE CURED Just think a minute of what is going on in your body. Two agencies at work, one constantly tearing you down, the other building you up or repairing, and as long as your vitality is good the repairing force keeps you in perfect health. Suppose you broke your arm, never had it set, or the proper appliance used to make it reunite and heal, the result would be that you would always have a broken arm. But you do have the proper attendance and care, and your arm in a short time is well again. So your rupture will heal if given the same chance—viz.: retain everything in a natural position the same as if there was no rupture and nature will do the rest. But the facts are:—you became ruptured, experienced very little or no pain, and you put off from day to day using the correct appliance needed to assist nature in its work. You needed a truss that would hold under every condition the strain from the injured part until it was healed, and strong enough to perform its work again. You need an appliance that HOLDS AND HEALS WHILE YOU WORK.

HOW COULD THIS HEAL The trusses that have been placed on afflicted ones in the past were constructed on the wrong principle and are now things of the past. In their day some were considered good and in some cases gave partial relief. They would hold one day and perhaps the next day would let the hernia out many times. In fact never two days alike because they were not self-adjusting. Some thought when the elastic was introduced, "here is a perfect truss at last," but they soon found out their mistake. They place all dependence on elastic webbing or belts which go around the body and they must be pulled or buckled tight enough so they are a torture, to bring the pads in position to bear on the rupture. Everyone knows that the sweat of the body will soon rot the elastic in the webbing, and so they must be continually stretching and giving out; never two days alike; consequently the intestines are being let out of their natural position, and never give the rupture a chance to heal. How can that kind of a truss cure a rupture? A rupture to be cured must be held securely in its natural position. It is probably a waste of time to tell you about old style trusses. You know it all. You know how you have suffered in warm weather from sweating and chafing. The belts and straps pulled up so tight over the galled parts that you would think, "I would rather die than suffer this any longer," and many, after repeated trials, unable to bear the torture any longer, are risking their lives and living in misery without a truss.

HOW TO CURE To effect a cure of hernia, all know that the hernial tumor or intestines must be held in an easy, comfortable and natural position, in fact to be in the same natural position that they would be in if there was no rupture. It has been my great fortune to have placed in my possession a new idea in the shape of what I may call a truss. Do not think it is one of those instruments of torture you have seen that has ropes, pulleys, elastics, etc. To compare mine with others would be like comparing the electric light with an old fashioned lamp. My appliance or truss stands out alone as a new idea, something far ahead of anything ever before placed upon a human being. A wonderful invention, holds with comfort everything in its proper, natural position, giving nature the chance to heal she has been waiting for. IT IS AS EASY TO WEAR AS A STOCKING, safe, simple, cleanly and durable.

CURED.

WILL LAST 100 YEARS IF NEEDED Cool and comfortable in warm weather, has no parts to chafe, does not absorb the foul odors of the body, always in place, always comfortable, always healing. It has no elastic webbing, no straps between the legs and no spring around the body. No matter what your position is, it never need changing.

YOU WORK WHILE IT HEALS No loss of time. Our appliance stands out alone, a new idea, PATENTED BY THE U.S. GOVERNMENT, and has been proven to be far in advance of any other appliance for the cure of rupture.

DOES IT DO THIS Does your truss hold you at all times? Is it comfortable, giving you a feeling of safety that you are all right? Is your rupture week by week growing smaller? If not, throw away that truss. Don't lose your health, perhaps your life, with such a contrivance. It is wrong in principle, wrong in construction, and may do a positive injury. In many cases the trusses are made and sold by persons who never saw a rupture. Belts, elastics, springs, and in fact everything that could be made, that some kind of a pad was fastened to, was put on to sufferers as a truss.

WHAT YOU WANT Is an appliance that holds everything in its natural position, SAFE, SURE, CLEANLY, HEALING, COMFORTABLE. So easy that you do not realize you are ruptured. You ask, "Is there such an appliance?" The answer is, "Yes! for I HAVE THAT APPLIANCE!" The inventor of this wonderful truss, the Rev. Jeremiah Hayden, who was chapiain of the 17th Maine Regiment, says:

THE PASTOR'S STORY "Finding myself ruptured, I sought advice of an elder brother who had the same trouble. He said, 'I have been ruptured for forty years, and have spent over $300 for trusses, and the one I have on now is the best one I ever had. It cost me $15 (it was an elastic truss) but it is breaking and I must get another.' On examination I found an elastic strap around him with every stitch of the webbing printed on his body, while the understrap that passed between his legs had chafed him so that he was red and sore. This led me to discover my truss, which is as EASY TO WEAR AS A STOCKING, and which ended all pain, danger and cost, and never needs repairing. I want to get it into the hands of my fellow-men who are suffering from this dangerous and painful infirmity, for I know it will be worth a hundred times its cost. I am broken down with kidney and heart disease, and I am in constant expectation of death. (82 years old.) The thought has been constantly before me: an invention which has the power to relieve so much suffering should not be buried with me. As I am not able, I want you to take measures to introduce it to the world, and if this is accomplished, I shall feel that my life has been of value to sufferers. As I have reflected upon the miseries of millions without means of relief, and the dismal certainty of their growing worse, and considered that I have in my keeping a comfortable, sure fitting, never failing remedy, amply proven and tested in my own and other cases, all which, at a glance, common sense will appreciate, I feel that it would be a giant wrong to mankind to have this invention buried with me, for AS I VALUE MY HONOR IN THIS WORLD AND MY SOUL IN THE NEXT, I unhesitatingly declare that a failure in any instance is impossible." A truly most wonderful invention; a blessing to mankind. An article that will cure, because it will hold everything just right, in its natural position, which gives the rupture a chance to re-unite and heal.

CAN YOU DOUBT What more need be said than the minister's statement printed above? Does any one believe for a moment that Mr. Hayden would make a statement he did not believe true? Will you be benefited by my method? It costs so little and success is certain. Why will you drag out a miserable existence when the means of relief are at your command?

TERMS: It is the perfect confidence I have in my method of cure that warrants me in adopting the above terms. Surely I have great faith in my way of treating rupture or I

NO CURE, NO PAY would never make the following proposition to you. It is a fair, honest offer that no other firm dare make, because they have not the goods to back it up. You will carefully fill up the Measure Blank with the answers to the questions asked thereon. We also ask you to sign our Special Order Blank. You will please send us those two blanks and the small sum stated on the Special Order Blank with your order. The reason I ask you to send this guarantee with the order is, there are so many people who are always writing for anything they can get for nothing. Many would write who are not ruptured. They know some one who is, and they want to get for nothing something they can sell the afflicted party for $10 or $15. There are others who have no gratitude in them; their object seems to be to get all they can for nothing and in no way ever think of repaying a favor or paying what rightfully belongs for them to pay. THIS I KNOW FROM ACTUAL EXPERIENCE. To keep such parties from troubling me, I have decided on the following plan: You are to send the two blanks before mentioned and the small amount stated thereon, the same to be held by us as a small guarantee of good faith. Upon receipt of same we at once send you by mail, all charges paid and safe delivery guaranteed, a truss, the same to be used by you. When cured you are to promptly send us $4.00 more and return our truss, which we only lend you. Many who get cured say they want to keep the truss. To all I will say that I will sell it at a fair price and charge according to the work done, and it will not be over $10. The terms I have offered are fair and liberal, no fair-minded person can say they are not, and I will not under any circumstances deviate from them.

Will you, after these plain and truthful statements, continue to suffer and risk your life by wearing an old style, imperfect truss? Dare you go without one knowing you are daily growing worse, and that within a short time you will become a total wreck? Dare you lay this aside before you give it a trial, which costs you nothing if you are not satisfied? Do you think it is a humbug? If we were frauds we would not ask such a small sum with the order; we would ask $5.00 or $10.00. A fraud never expects a second order, so they get all the first.

We can fit an infant, or a man or woman weighing 300 lbs. Fleshy ladies having navel ruptures will find it a great blessing. No hot bands around you. It is the only truss that can be worn by women and be clean and comfortable. Ruptured women who are pregnant can wear it and avoid many hours and days of misery. Don't put off ordering it. Do it today; tomorrow may be too late. What more need be said to convince you? We warrant A PERFECT FIT IN EVERY CASE.

SEE THE TESTIMONIALS Be sure to fill out the two blanks. The truss fits all kinds of ruptures. In closing will say I have cured many who have had bad ruptures and can cure you if you will only let me. I can be the means of doing you much good, and hope to hear from you in the near future. If you wish the names of people in your own state who endorse our method, send postage and we will send you their names.

MY GUARANTEE The perfect confidence I have in my truss, and the knowledge I have from actual experience of its curing properties enables me to guarantee every truss. Your rupture may be small, or it may be one that only at times gives you little pain or trouble. Did you ever know a rupture that did not from month to month grow worse? Let me say right here that there is nothing so dangerous as a rupture. Nothing keeps a man or woman so near death, nothing causes so much trouble or the cause of so many surgical operations. The ways of Providence are wonderful. This advertisement may be one of its methods of warning, coming to you unawares, which if neglected means your death. Don't be deceived or have your mind changed by some one who has trusses for sale or who gets a commission by getting a truss for you. They will lose the money, so they will say, "Don't send for the Surehold Truss; it is so cheap it can't be good," and then they will offer to sell you something costing $5.00 and upwards, and say, "This is good because we ask a big price for it." The fact is they make so few sales that when they do find a customer they charge enough to keep themselves going until they get another victim to fleece. Just say to such people that the Surehold Truss is not sold, it is only loaned, and just as soon as you are cured I get the truss back and $4.00 more. I have thousands of patients, so it pays me. Ask others to let you have their goods on the same terms as I do, and I will warrant you will get some flimsy excuse.

A MAN CURED WHILE HE WORKED. DEAR SIR: I cannot find words to express my thanks. I tried many kinds and never one that would hold me. The Surehold holds me in all places and at all kinds of work, and I have never lost a day's time. I am cured entirely and have not had to wear a truss for many weeks. I have worked hard shoveling and wheeling coal; traveling up and down stairs at my work as watchman. Some nights I have put in more than a ton of coal. G. S. HOSLEY, Norwood, Mass. Granite St.

A WOMAN CURED AFTER 18 YEARS OF SUFFERING. AGE 61. DEAR SIR: I cannot say enough in favor of your truss. Please accept my most sincere thanks for the benefit I have received. I have not worn a truss for three months now. I had previously worn a truss day and night for over 18 years. I have worked hard all the fall drying fruit and doing the duties of the household. I heartily wish that every man, woman or child who has suffered as I did would be convinced that your truss will cure rupture. I wish you long life and prosperity and an eternal life in the future. Yours truly, MARTHA DAVIS, Diamond, Ark.

A BOY CURED MY BOY. SIR: Your truss has cured my boy when no other would, in the time you said it would. I am more than thankful to you. Every word you said was true. No need of any child suffering when they can be cured so easily.

MRS. MARY YARNELL, Middleton, Ohio.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

FEBRUARY looks to the LUNATION or new moon which occurs in the evening of the 30th of January, this year, at about quarter past 8 o'clock, for its trestle-board of indications of public events for the month. A figure erected to the time of that new moon shows the 17th degree of Virgo rising and the 15th degree of Gemini culminating. The conjoined luminaries are in the 5th house of the figure within a few degrees of Mars and Mercury also in the 5th house. Jupiter and Herschel are together in Sagittarius in the 3rd house close to the cusp of the 4th; Saturn stands in the 4th and Venus is close to the cusp of the 7th.

Mercury ruler of the Ascending and culminating signs is ruler of the figure. He is near the place of the lunation and near to Mars and the support of Jupiter and Herschel. The activity of Mars is marked. This coupled with the benevolent rays from the great benefic Jupiter and from Herschel shows that "Merchants, tradesmen, and all such as give their minds to Learning, Arts, and Sciences shall have a successful and prosperous season" during February. Mars indicates unusual activity in army movements by successes in all directions. The moon, ruler of the 11th and so near to Mars the author of strife and contention, shows wordy warfare in Congress where sharp criticisms of the Administration are indulged in, but the overwhelming force of Jupiter in his own house and Herschel the disposer of Mars, both in favorable aspect to the ruler of the figure and the conjoined luminaries, indicates the irresistible onward march of the country to its high station in its great race among the nations of the world. Trade continues to improve and the country grows more and more prosperous.

Venus so near the cusp of the 7th house indicates an increase in the marriage rates and shows marriage of some lady high in station, such as engages the attention if not adverse criticism of the public in a marked degree.

Saturn in the 4th indicates some unusually cold weather in February.

The Lunation falling in the 5th house with Mars cautions us to have extraordinary care of children for the month, for avoidance, as much as possible, of some eruptive trouble which threatens to assume the proportions of an epidemic. Falling in Aquarius it is likely to develop itself as a blood trouble and affect the heart and throat. In all eruptive troubles which visit us, whether of the nature of measles, scarlet fever, or otherwise, let parents be particularly watchful of the throats of the little ones and promptly arrest any dangerous symptoms that develop. Fortunately the benevolent influence of Jupiter intervenes to help overcome a great part of the mischief. There will be considerable increase of mortality among adults from complications of heart troubles, pleurisy, and troubles with the urinary system.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR FEBRUARY, 1900.

FEBRUARY. 1—Thursday. Give particular attention to the elegant pursuits and real estate matters during the early hours of this day when also have dental work done; urge all transactions relative to furnishings and decoration, also architectural work and engagements; but as the noon is passed be vigilant of financial matters; live within thy means and purchase only the needful things that can not be bought under more satisfactory conditions; be sure not to have transactions with banks, government authorities or railways or other large corporate bodies.

2—Friday. One of the excellent days of the month for the elegant occupations and polite arts, until the late afternoon hours; use the forenoon for commercial transactions pertaining to wearing apparel and all fancy and ornamental goods; the later hours are fractious and less fortunate for any important dealings when also the tongue may need a check and the mental impulses require moderation; correspondence then is likely to be unsatisfactory and estimates and accounts are more inclined to error.

3—Saturday. A superior day for the vigorous prosecution of all general business. REGULUS especially advises his friends to seize this time for crowding the principal undertakings in life. It is especially recommended for the beginning of journeys, milling operations, mental working and the extensive manufacture or purchase or sale of machinery, and particular preference should be given to all business connected with the mechanical and ingenious pursuits, also dealings with druggists, chemists, tanners and mechanics generally; buy goods for trade; open new stores, etc. If it be the anniversary of thy birthday then these suggestions apply with even greater force and thou mayst reckon with much more than the ordinary assurance, upon many prosperous weeks in the immediate future. The same is true, in great measure, of persons born about the 3rd of April, or 4th of October, of past years. Admonitory suggestions are invited for persons born about the 1st of May, 3rd of August, or 2d of November, of past years; and these persons need to be unusually discreet and patient under any kind of excitement, especially in connection with any literary work or any commercial engagements now being entered into.

4—Sunday. Thy pastor's discourse, if extemporaneous, is likely on this day to contain many peculiar sentiments and many radical ideas; the aged are pleasantly disposed and the oddities and curiosities of life engage the thoughts.

5—Monday. This day is favorable in the forenoon hours for hiring or purchasing houses or lands and dealing with miners, tinners, plumbers, brickmakers, and the laboring classes particularly; the elegant pursuits are not favored in the afternoon, when social engagements prove less satisfactory than usual.

6—Tuesday. An evil forenoon, when form no hasty conclusions in business; litigation and contention are likely to interfere seriously with the happy outcome of affairs of magnitude or importance at this time begun; be not rash in thought or act and scrutinize carefully all business enterprises now presenting themselves; do not seek promotion in public positions nor offend thine employer; be cautious in the use of the pen and do not be disappointed if thy literary labors are disappointing; the evening is peculiarly favorable for social, musical and dramatical entertainments; and the afternoon is recommended for engagements relating to the artistic and decorative in life.

7—Wednesday. Do not depend on this day and be very prudent in all thine acts; thy pecuniary transactions are more likely to result in loss than gain; hold fast the purse-strings.

8—Thursday. Affairs commenced at this time will prosper and REGULUS advises his friends to engage in the active prosecution of their several callings, but particularly those in the strictly intellectual pursuits in life; begin important work of all kind whether in mechanism, trade or the fine arts; have surgical operations performed and experiment in chemistry; let judges weigh testimony and decide important cases and lawyers take initiatory steps and urge proceedings in litigation of magnitude.

9—Friday. Defer matters of much importance in the artistic pursuits; it is a poor day to replenish thy stock of artistic, fancy, or decorative goods or to make any engagements in dramatic matters; be sure and avoid beginning anything concerned with houses or lands and do not be surprised if the afternoon baffles and disappoints thee grievously.

10—Saturday. The morning hours are adverse for the literary pursuits, but as the forenoon advances let all honorable undertakings be vigorously urged; buy goods for trade; have money transactions of consequence; deal with judges, bankers, lawyers, and persons in the ecclesiastical callings.

11—Sunday. There is little of promise for this day, especially of assistance to the clergy, those connected with religion or for matters of an ecclesiastical nature.

12—Monday. Choose this day for seeking audience with the ladies or for leading thy fair one to the altar; purchase wearing apparel or goods for decoration or dress; engage with thy tailor, dressmaker or milliner and do all things requiring the exercise of special taste; let the musician and the landscape painter improve the moments of this day to their utmost; purchase goods for trade and crowd all important undertakings; literary engagements should be urged and the mind be vigorously used in forwarding all enterprises; do correspondence of moment; hire help, and travel.

13—Tuesday. The early morning hours are the best for dealing with government officers, railway officials, and superintendents of public works also for the study or investigation of uncommon subjects; the latter half of the day is evil and disappointing when thou shouldst avoid all conditions of violence or excitement, keeping a careful eye out against hurts, burns and all inflammatory troubles; be not careless with firearms nor in handling inflammables.

14—Wednesday. Be not rash in word or act; travel as little as possible and have unusual care in using the pen; annoyances in correspondence and through writings will come; seek no advantage at the hands of officers of state, merchants, travelers, teachers or otherwise ingenious persons; thieves are likely to be unusually active in the 24 hours ending at noon of this day; and there are likely to be some very destructive fires in these passing days as well as some bad accidents from machinery and explosives, the passing time is peculiarly contentious and calls for patience and deliberation in thine important engagements.

15—Thursday. See that thy means do not "take to themselves wings" in the forenoon of this day; avoid the money lender and let thy purchases be governed by thine actual needs rather than for profit or money advantages.

16—Friday. The first half of this day favors the light and elegant occupations and gives success to the efforts of the musician, artist and decorator; let architectural matters engage the mind and make engagements pertaining to building houses or improvement of lands.

17—Saturday. Conditions on this day specially discourage the making of contracts about lands or houses and but little if any profit need be expected from dealings with contractors, shipwrights, plumbers, farmers, miners and generally those engaged in the dirty and laborious avocations; there are likely to be some serious accidents from poisons and suicides from poisoning will be more than ordinarily frequent in these middle days of February; the fair sex are unfavorably affected and quarrels and discord among lovers will be responsible for more than usual unhappiness just at this time; do not take this day for buying goods of an artistic or decorative character nor for inaugurating any new undertaking.

18—Sunday. One of the promising Sabbath days of the month, particularly conducive to the success of pulpit efforts; the religious discourse will be earnest and eloquent.

19—Monday. Unusual circumspection is advised in thine undertakings with the pen on this day; have extreme care if engaged in any speculative ventures; some bad losses occur in business circles and frauds and defalcations are unearthed in these passing days; do not sign any money obligation; unpleasant features in correspondence or in accounts develop at this time and care in these repects is urged.

20—Tuesday. Vigorously prosecute all business on this day, giving preference, if any, to the forenoon for buying, selling, or improving real estate; for architectural designs and labors and making engagements with the laboring classes; use the afternoon for thy literary work and for transactions with the intellectual classes; travel, study, and enter upon educational work of all kinds, provided thy nativity also favors in that direction.

21—Wednesday. Be not over-sensitive or become involved in unpleasant controversies nor have dealings with persons in the mechanical callings or manufacturing enterprises; keep a check upon thy temper and be deliberate in word and act; deal with persons of wealth and high in station in the evening.

22—Thursday. A day of very indifferent promises when thou shouldst not ask favors of superiors, persons in authority or public officers; the afternoon promises many petty annoyances and disappointments.

23—Friday. This day has but little to recommend it and the forenoon should be specially avoided for the execution of deeds or writings nor should the judgment be too implicitly relied upon unless the nativity is particularly promising of good just at this time; do not travel or concern thyself with writings pertaining to patents, copyrights, or trademarks; as the noon is passed give thy best energies to business.

24—Saturday. Conditions on this day are baffling and disappointing and matters of much moment are better deferred until a more favorable time; have no dealings with thy landlord nor with contractors, plumbers, miners, farmers, nor with any engaged in the dirty occupations.

25—Sunday. Peculiar features of religious doctrine are disclosed on this day and the middle hours are unfortunate for musical or artistic conversations or executions; avoid the fair sex and beware of unusual indulgencies of the palate or appetite; the evening hours are superior for mental efforts and are recommended for literary matters.

26—Monday. The early hours are poor and indicate necessity for care of the purse, that extravagant expenditures are not made or needless losses suffered; the day after ten o'clock should be fully employed.

27—Tuesday. A very favorable day inviting travel, business activity and enterprise; buy goods for trade; speculate if thy nativity be also fairly favorable; deal with banks and persons of wealth and refinement.

28—Wednesday. Be prompt to employ the favoring conditions of this day in the pursuit of art, music, and for all elegant avocations; deal in fancy goods, purchase wearing apparel and articles of adornment and seek audience with the fair sex; look out for quarrels and be not oversensitive or too aggressive in the afternoon.

PERFECT MANHOOD

Prof. Jules Laborde's Marvelous French Preparation of

"CALTHOS"

For Lost Manhood.

Full 5 Days' Treatment SENT FREE By Sealed Mail.

NO C. O. D. OR DEPOSIT SCHEME.

Every person who is a sufferer from nervous diseases should write the Von Mohl Co., Cincinnati, Ohio, at once, and accept their offer of a five days' trial treatment free of charge. This is no C. O. D. or DEPOSIT scheme but a liberal proposition made to unfortunate sufferers by this long-established concern, which is the largest importer of specifics for nervous and sexual diseases in the world.

The Von Mohl Co. has the sole American rights for Prof. Laborde's French preparation of "Calthos," the only remedy known to advanced medical science that will positively cure nervous debility. This remedy has for years been used as a specific in the French and German armies, and since its introduction into the United States has cured many thousands of sufferers, and the remarkable success of the remedy in Europe has been repeated in this country.

In order to place this wonderful treatment in the hands of every person who suffers the mental and physical anguish of sexual weakness, The Von Mohl Co., has decided to send a free trial treatment to all who write at once. The remedy is sent by mail in a plain package, and there is no publicity in receiving it or taking it. Accompanying the medicine there is a full treatise in plain language for you to read. Take the medicine privately with perfect safety, and a sure cure is guaranteed.

Lost vitality creeps upon men unawares. Do not deceive yourself or remain in ignorance while you are being dragged down by this insidious disease. No matter what the cause may be, whether early abuses, excesses or overwork and business cares, the results are the same—premature loss of strength and memory, emissions, impotency, varicocele and shrunken parts. This specific remedy will cure you at any stage before epilepsy results, with ensuing consumption and insanity. "Calthos" goes directly to the seat of the trouble, no matter of how long standing, and the patient feels the benefit of the first day's treatment. In five days the medicines sent free will make you feel like a new man.

The Von Mohl Co. often receives the most astonishing testimonials from persons who have taken only five days' treatment. They have thousands of testimonials from those who have been permanently cured after having been given up by doctors, misled and ruined in health by disreputable medical schemers, and when they had given up their last hope for health and happiness. No sensible person will permit his name to be used for a testimonial as an admission that he had any of the diseases for which the preparation of "Calthos" is a specific cure. Some irresponsible advertisers are using "made-up" testimonials, but the Von Mohl Co. invariably declines to make public the names or correspondence of any patients who have been cured by "Calthos."

Five days' treatment will be placed in your hands free of cost, and you are earnestly urged for your own sake to send for it without delay. Write to day and send your address. It is not necessary to give embarrassing details of your symptons. The book accompanying the five days' treatment will enable you to take the medicine in private and treat yourself successfully at home. It costs nothing to try this remedy. It may cost you a great deal more to let this offer go by. Write today. Address THE VON MOHL CO. 935 B, CINCINNATI, OHIO. Largest Importers of Standard Preparations in the United States.

A Complete Outfit of 44 Tools FREE

GREATEST MONEY MAKER AND MONEY SAVER EVER SEEN: NEEDED IN EVERY HOUSE IN THE WORLD.

Hundreds of dollars are wasted every year in paying for repairs which could be done by you just as well as by the person you hire. "Yes," you will say, "I could do this work if I only had the tools." You have to hire the plumber or cobbler and pay him for his time while you stand around and look on, watching him do the work which you could do as well as he, but it is always that you have no tools. We have put together the best kit of tools for repairing which was ever seen, and we will sell the entire outfit for less than half the money for which you could buy it at any store. The outfit consists of forty-four first-class tools, as shown in the above cut, viz: 1 iron last for men's work; 1 iron last for boy's work; 1 iron last for women's work; 1 iron last for children's work; 1 iron stand for lasts; 1 shoehammer; 1 shoeknife; 1 peg awl handle; 1 peg awl; 1 wrench for peg awl handle; 1 sewing awl handle; 1 sewing awl; 1 stabbing awl handle; 1 stabbing awl; 1 bottle leather cement; 1 bottle rubber cement; 1 bunch bristles; 1 ball shoe thread; 1 ball shoe wax; 1 pkg clinch nails, 4-8 in.; 1 pkg clinch nails 5-8 in.; 1 pkg clinch nails, 6-8 in.; 1 pkg. heel nails; 4 prs. heel plates, assorted sizes; 6 harness needles; 1 harness and saw clamp; 1 box slotted rivets, assorted sizes; 1 rivet set for same; 1 harness and belt punch; 1 soldering iron, ready for use; 1 handle for same; 1 bar solder; 1 bar resin; 1 bottle soldering fluid; 1 copy directions for halfsoling, etc., 1 copy directions for soldering all securely packed, together with directions for use, in neat case. These tools bought at a hardware store separately would cost between $7.00 and $9.00. You can repair boots and shoes, tap and heel them, mend your harness or make a new one, mend all kinds of tinware, repair pumps, plumbing and similar work and do all kinds of leather work about carriages, etc., as well as repair and mend rubber boots, rubbers, overshoes, and all kinds of rubber made articles. The clamp is used for mending harnesses and filing saws. Has a coil spring and is made of iron. You can easily save five times the cost of the outfit in six months and make a heap of money doing little repairs for your neighbors and others. "A stitch in time saves nine," and if you have these tools in your house you can make repairs and save a great deal of money which you would pay if you let a break go or hired a man to do your repairing work for you. Every one of these tools are full sized, practical, neat and cheap. It is the only complete outfit in the market and thousands have been sold in past years for $3 when the outfit contained but about half as many smaller articles to people living in the country and small towns as well as the city. This repairing outfit, weighing 20 lbs. will be sent by freight complete as above described for only $1.62 which includes a 6 months' trial subscription to this paper.

GREAT PREMIUM OFFER.—If you will get up a club of 6 yearly trial subscribers to this paper at the special price of 25 cents each, we will send you one of these repairing outfits as a present to you.

NOTICE TO AGENTS.

A Profitable Business

FOR MEN AND WOMEN WHO ARE WILLING TO WORK.

$3.00 a Day Sure.

you are out of work, or are not satisfied with your present ness and would like to make more money, it will be to your rest to read this notice. We do not offer you a chance to a fortune without work, but we do offer you an opportun- make money much faster than you can make it at any kind of work. The country is flooded with circulars offer- ances to make money at the rate of from twenty to fifty a day; such offers are not business-like, and all agents mount to anything are disgusted with such circulars, and of them are thrown aside without being read. If you are ig for an opportunity to make twenty to fifty dollars a you might as well throw this notice aside also; but if you d like to engage in a good paying business, you will do to read this notice through carefully. Then you can use r own judgment as to whether our offer is a reasonable one ot.

e guarantee that anyone who is willing to work can make n $3 to $5 a day at this business. We admit that $3 to $5 a is not much of an inducement when compared to the state- nts made by some firms, who offer all the way from $20 to a day for selling various articles. We do not make you such wing promises, but what we do offer you has the advantage g being true. We might offer agents a sure chance of making from $20 to $50 a day, but the chances are that anyone who would believe such unreasonable nonsense would not know enough to earn his board at any kind of business. That is not the kind of agents we are in quest of; we want reliable agents with common sense, who are willing to work for good pay, and not those who are looking for an opportunity to make a fortune without work. We believe the only way to get such agents and keep them, is to furnish them with a good thing to sell, a real genuine bargain, and then to tell them the exact truth about the business. We have a large number of agents at work, and we know for a certainty what working agents can make. We know that $3 a day is the very lowest; most of our agents are averaging $4 and $5 a day, and often some of them make a good deal more than that. We have several agents who are clear- ing from $7 to $10 a day. But these are great workers operating in the best territory, and, of course, everyone cannot do as well, but it is easy for anyone to make, at the very least, $3 a day above all expenses in any territory. We haven't a single working agent who is clearing, on an average, less than $3 a day. Now, be sure that you understand us: We don't say that lazy, shiftless agents will make $3 a day, for they can't do it at this or any other business, but what we do say is that agents who are willing to work, not too hard, but the same as they would expect to work at any other business, can easily clear $3 a day above all expenses, in any territory, and if they have good territory to work in they can make anywhere from $5 to $7, and even $10 a day. If you want a good chance to work and get good pay for it, you will find it to your interest to read this notice through carefully.

The articles which we have for you to sell are a line of forks, spoons, etc., made of a new metal called "Brazil Silver." We will describe this new line of goods the best we can, then you can judge for yourself whether we are offering you a good chance to make money or not.

BRAZIL SILVER.

Warranted for Twenty-five Years.

Brazil Silver is believed to be the very best metal in existence for the manufacture of forks and spoons; it has all the lustre and brilliancy of burnished coin silver, and is much harder and more durable, in fact, it is impossible to wear it out. It is absolutely indestructible. The goods made of this metal are the same all the way through, there being no plating to wear off they will remain as good as new for any length of time. For all practical purposes in the manufacture of table ware this Brazil Silver is superior to coin silver. It is as lustrous and as pure as coin silver, and being much harder it will wear even longer than silver; in fact it is absolutely impossible to wear it out. It will wear forever. As there is no plating to wear off, the metal being the same all the way through, it stands to reason that you can't wear it out. Our confidence in the metal is so great that we guarantee it to wear twenty-five years. We give a guarantee signed by the company warranting the goods to wear and to give perfect satisfaction for twenty-five years. We are an old, strong and thoroughly established firm with ample capital to carry on our business and make our guaranty as good as the Bank of England. In selling these goods an agent can recommend them with the greatest of confidence, for they are just as represented, absolutely indestructible. And, furthermore, our guarantee warranting the goods to give satisfaction for twenty-five years, clears the agent from all responsibility in the matter; for if any article fails to give perfect satisfaction, no matter how long it has been in use, we hold ourselves ready to refund the money paid for the article. These goods are the same metal all the way through; they will never wear out. They always wear white and bright. We give a guarantee signed by the company, warranting every piece of Brazil Silver to wear twenty-five years. You can sell these goods to your best friends with perfect confidence, for every sale is as much a benefit to your customer as to yourself.

Working with goods that are warranted to wear and give satisfaction for so long a time as twenty-five years, and by a Company, too, whose capital is sufficiently large to make their guarantee good for almost any amount, is an advantage which no other firm is prepared to offer. If you want to make money fast now is the time to do it. If you think that five-dollar bills are good things to have, now is the time to get them. Never in the history of the agency business have agents had as good a chance to make money rapidly, and it is reasonably sure that they will never have another chance like it.

It is easy to make from $3 to $5 a day at this business.

All Marked with Initial Letters, Without any Extra Cost.

Among all classes there has always been a strong desire to have their table ware marked with their initial letter, but on account of the heavy expense of having it marked only a very few have been able to afford it. Heretofore the cost of artistically marking table ware has been even greater than the cost of the goods; now, by our new methods, we are able to offer these elegant Brazil Silver goods, all marked with any initial letter desired in the very highest style of the art, without any extra cost for marking. These Brazil Silver goods, even if unmarked, would be the greatest bargain ever offered the public in table ware, but with the additional and highly desirable feature of being all marked with beautiful and artistic initial letters, these goods are not only great bargains in table ware, but are the greatest bargains of any kind that have ever been offered to the public through any catalogue or in any other way.

The people are always ready enough to buy what they want when it is presented to them in the form of a genuine bargain. Well, here is absolutely the greatest bargain every offered, and the agent who works with it will find that what he has is earnestly desired at nearly every house he visits; it is easy to get orders when you can offer great bargains, that the people really want and can afford.

It is easy to make from $3 to $5 a day at this business.

Table and Dessert Knives.

Our knives are made of the finest tempered cutlery steel and are triple plate, in other words every dozen knives is plated with 12 dwt. of pure silver and hand burnished. Our knives are of the highest grade, fully equal to Rogers' or any knives made. These knives will not wear as long as Brazil Silver goods, but they will wear as long as any knives made. We guarantee them to wear ten years in constant use. If not in constant use they will wear proportionately longer. We give a guarantee, signed by the Company, warranting the knives to wear and to give perfect satisfaction to the purchaser for ten years. As knives are usually used in families they will wear much longer, anywhere from fifteen to twenty years. They are fully equal to Rogers' knives and only cost about two-thirds as much. It may seem strange to some that we can sell so staple an article as silver plated knives at such reduced prices, but we are doing it. It is our way of giving the public good, solid value for their money. We are saving our customers about one-third of the price at which the same grade of knives are sold at the stores and jewelers. Any one who will take the trouble to compare our knives and prices with triple plate 12 dwt. knives sold at the stores and jewelers, will be convinced of the truth of our statements. We are making a profit, of course, but our unequal facilities and immense trade make it possible for us to undersell all competitors, and our customers are getting the benefit of the lowest prices known in the silverware trade. We are not only selling at greatly reduced prices, but we also guarantee every article to be exactly as represented and to give perfect satisfaction to the purchaser, or money refunded.

The First Thing to Do.

If you decide to accept the agency, the first thing to do is to send to us for the agent's case of samples, which is the most complete and perfect case of samples that has ever been prepared for the convenience of agents. Our complete and perfect case of samples is not to be compared with anything that has ever been sent to agents before. It contains the very best and most salable articles in the world. There is nothing in the market that agents can sell as fast and sell as easily and make as much money out of, as they can the goods contained in this splendid case of samples, and everything is arranged and explained so that any agent can't fail to understand just how to go to work to make a great success of the business. As soon as you receive the case of samples you are ready for business. And if you are willing to work you are just as sure to make from $3 to $5 a day as the sun is to rise. Take the case of samples and canvass your territory according to the directions sent with the samples, until you have taken orders for the amount of goods you are prepared to send for. Then order the goods from us and fill your orders, and so continue.

The Magnificent Case of Samples Which We Furnish to Agents.

The case of samples which we furnish to agents contains the following articles:

One Sample Table Knife, retail price, $2.10 per set of six	35	cents each
One Sample Dessert Knife, retail price, $1.95 per set of six	32 1-2	cents each
One Sample Table Fork, retail price, $1.95 per set of six	32 1-2	cents each
One Sample Table Spoon, retail price, $1.95 per set of six	32 1-2	cents each
One Sample Dessert Fork, retail price, $1.80 per set of six	30	cents each
One Sample Dessert Spoon, retail price, $1.80 per set of six	30	cents each
One Sample Tea Spoon, retail price, 95 cents per set of six	15 5-6	cents each
One Sugar Shell	25	cents each
One Butter Knife	25	cents each
One Salt or Pepper Shaker	25	cents each
Total retail value of Samples	$2.83 1-3

We also send you with the case of samples a large and very beautiful catalogue, illustrating a full line of plated ware, such as Casters, Pickle Cruets, Butter Dishes, Tea Sets, Napkin Rings, etc., etc., etc.

Reckoning the above samples at our lowest retail prices they amount to $2.83 1-3. We furnish them to agents nicely put up in an elegant sample case or roll, for only $1.00, which is $1.83 1-3 less than they amount to at our regular retail prices. This is less than one-half of the retail value of the samples, and much less than they cost us. The sample case or roll, which the samples are put up in costs us nearly as much as we require you to send for the samples, case and all.

Wholesale Prices.

Wholesale or agents' prices and all necessary information for carrying on the business will be furnished with the Outfit. Remember we make everything plain to you about wholesale prices, methods, etc., when we send you the Outfit.

VERY IMPORTANT.

The business we are offering is straightforward and honest in everyway, shape and manner. Our goods are in every respect, just as we represent them to be. The Outfit we furnish our agents is exactly as we represent it, and is always sent the same day the order is received, just as agreed. We have tried to state these facts so they could and would be believed and still we are constantly receiving letters from parties who would like to engage in the business and would do so if they felt sure we were telling the truth and would do as we agree. Many of these doubters have been cheated and are not altogether to blame for doubting; the most of them say they think we are honest, they say we talk honest, but as they have already been swindled they don't feel like risking even one dollar and so, although our business is in every respect just as represented, and we always do just as we promise, we lose the services of a great many agents and they lose the benefit they might derive from the business because they are afraid we may not be telling the truth. Now, to overcome this spirit of doubt, we have decided to send Samples to all who wish us to do so, C. O. D., with privilege of examination at the express office. It costs us from twenty-five to forty cents more to send the samples this way, as we have to pay that amount for return charges on the money, but we are willing to do it and so prove to all that are interested that the Outfit and our goods are just what we claim. If after reading this notice you think you would like to give the business a trial, but wish to see the Sample Case before you pay the one dollar cut out the following printed form, fill it out and send it to us and we will send the Outfit to your express office prepaid, and give the express agent instructions to let you thoroughly examine the Outfit, then, if you are satisfied that we have told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and are also satisfied that you can make money selling our goods, you can pay the express agent one dollar and take the Outfit. If you are not satisfied, you can refuse to take it and the agent will return it to us. No other firm has ever made such an offer. We have adopted this plan in order to convince the most skeptical and to secure the services of all the good working agents in the United States.

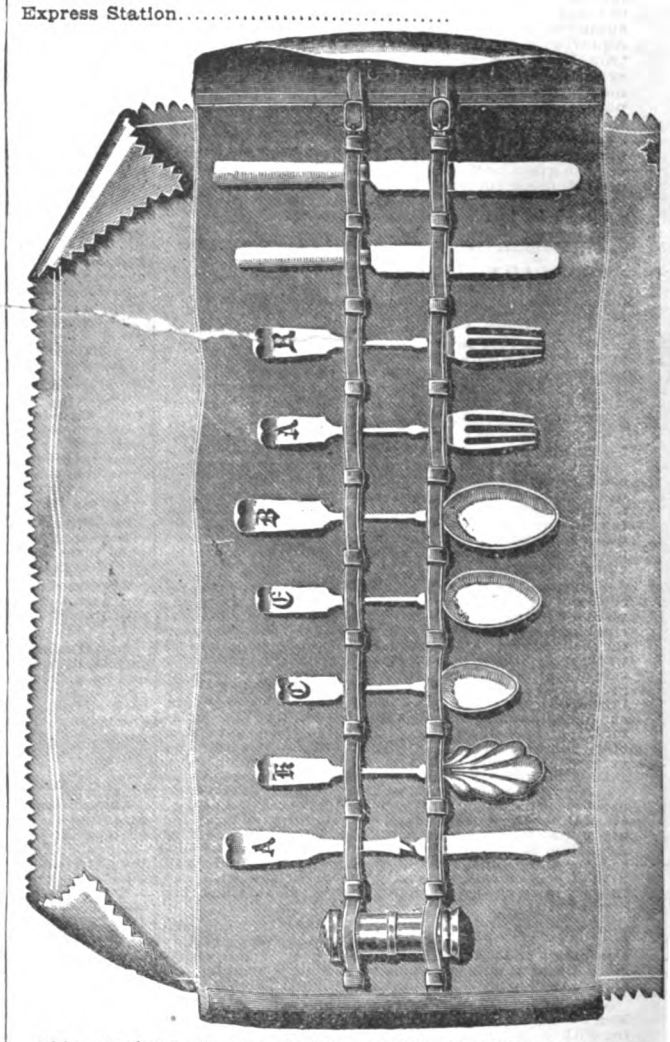
ROYAL MANUFACTURING CO., DETROIT, MICH.:



GENTLEMEN—Send the Outfit by Express, C. O. D., with privilege of examination. If I find the Outfit just as you say, I will pay the one dollar required and give the business a fair trial, but if I am not satisfied that the Outfit is as good as you recommend it to be, I shall refuse to receive it. Now, remember, the understanding is that I am not to take the Outfit unless I, myself, am satisfied that it is all right. It must all depend on my own judgment. If I am satisfied, I will take the Outfit; if I am not satisfied, I shall not take it and shall not pay the one dollar If you want to send the Outfit with this understanding, send it along C. O. D., with privilege of examination.

This cut shows the Sample Case or Roll, and how the samples appear put up ready for business. The Roll is made of highly finished waterproof canvas, and lined with soft flannel goods. The samples are held in place by strong straps. The whole rolls up and fastens with a leather strap which is firmly fastened to the back of the Roll. This is the most practical arrangement for carrying the samples that could be thought of. When rolled up the Case is compact and easy to carry. When open the samples show to the best possible advantage, making a good impression at first sight. This Sample Roll gives a business-like appearance; it is substantial and handsome, and invariably gives the impression that there is something valuable inside. All are anxious to see what it is you are carrying around with such care. This is of importance as it secures attention and interest at the start. There is nothing like having your samples put up in a business-like shape; it gives a favorable impression from the start, which is half the battle. It is the same in all matters. A store that looks like business attracts customers; while, from a shanty store, you would not, as a rule, expect the best things. The fact is, in the agency business, as in every other business, you must have things fixed up just right if you expect to succeed. Our Brazil Silver Goods are the best that have ever been offered for the price, or anywhere near it. The new feature of being marked with beautiful and artistic initial letters, free of cost, is the greatest popular hit of the times; and the Sample Roll is arranged so as to show the goods off to the best possible advantage. Furthermore, we carefully teach every agent just how to take advantage of all these splendid qualities and popular features. Is it any wonder that our agents succeed better than those who are working for other firms?

We Prepay all Express Charges on Everything. We pay the charges on the Outfit and on all goods ordered. Remember, we pay all express charges.

LAUGHING GAS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY P. F. BARNES.

"WELL, the jig's up!"

Clarence Brownell, just out of Columbia University and fortunate enough to possess a bank president for a father, had rented a room high up in the Equitable building to carry on some of his scientific experiments. He had been interested in what the physicists call the "grating spectrometer", and that very morning the tinners had delivered a long, slender shaft of some fifteen joints of stove-pipe fastened end to end, which he expected to use in connection with a photographic spectrum. This shaft he had mounted on a pivot resting on the window sill, and was sweeping it around like a telescope.

Suddenly a voice apparently right by his side announced despairingly, "Well, the jig's up!" and another voice replied:

"Same here, John. I'm done for. That last speculation ruined me."

Clarence Brownell stared up and down, and only after the voices resumed did he discover that they were coming through the stove pipe.

"The only thing left to do," said the voice belonging to "John", "is to skip, but what's the use of that if you have to skip broke?"

"Correct," answered the other. "I've got a scheme that I'm going to try for my part, and if you're desperate enough to come along I'll let you in."

"Speak on."

"Well, there is the object lesson crossing the street now. See?"

Clarence looked down into Broadway and saw a line of seven clerks crossing the street in single file, each carrying two large leather-covered cases. These were followed by other clerks, carrying packages of books and satchels. The line was headed by the tall, gaunt figure of Andy McDowell, an ex-detective of the metropolitan police system, and guarded on either side by two strapping watchmen armed with rifles.

The young man recognized the procession instantly as the office force of his father's bank, the American National, transferring the valuables from the vaults of the Mercantile Deposit Co., to the temporary quarters of the bank in the Boreel building across the way. Twice every day for the last month, at the beginning and at the close of banking hours, this parade of wealth had crossed the street, halting all traffic, cable-cars and pedestrians. The old bank building had been torn down, and as the Boreel building contained no burglar proof vaults, this arrangement for the care of the funds would continue until the new building was finished.

"There is the chance I mean," said the voice of "John's" fellow conspirator. "Hello! What is the meaning of this stove pipe?" Something hit Clarence in the face. The speaker had tossed the stump of a cigar down the shaft.

"I don't know," said "John". "A ventilator, I suppose. But you don't mean to make a grab for that boodle! Why, man, you would be shot or clubbed to death before you started. Don't you see those fellows sitting in the bank windows? Every one of them has a rifle!"

"Suppose we were to jerk it away from them without showing ourselves."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed the other, contemptuously. "And still," he added, as though an idea began to dawn on him, "it might be——"

"Of course it might! Imagine, for instance, that a chain could be hooked to that string of boxes and connected to the moving cable of the street cars. How long do you think those clerks would hold onto it?"

"That strap wouldn't stand the strain."

"That strap is really a steel chain wrapped in leather. Of course I will jerk it upwards and not along the street. My machinery is all ready but I need a helper and I offer you half! What do you say?"

"When can we do it? I've got to have a hundred thousand dollars by to-morrow noon."

"We can do it this afternoon. They come back at exactly ten minutes after four."

"Very well, I'm with you. I would like to see what machinery you have rigged up."

"Come on. I only expect to be able to catch up the strong boxes that are chained together. It seems a shame to let the other satchels escape. But we ought to secure half a million at any rate."

The listener heard their footsteps across an uncarpeted floor, and then the door slammed. He leaned far out of the window, and looking up in the direction that the stove pipe pointed, tried to locate the room. But a cornice interfered.

"The direction of the pipe ought to help me to find the place," he muttered, dragging it in. An exclamation of disgust escaped him. The pipe was bent nearly at right angles, and from all the indications it afforded the conspirators might have been in any one of a half dozen rooms on the next floor above, or even in the Mills building adjoining. He hurriedly donned hat and coat and rushed off to find his father in the Boreel building.

A few minutes later President Brownell, Clarence and Andy McDowell were closeted together. Mr. Brownell's sole care was for the valuables. McDowell wanted to capture the robbers. Clarence agreed to both propositions, but wanted to accomplish the capture in a scientific manner. Finally the following note was sent to the chief of police:

"I have reason to believe that an attempt will be made this afternoon to seize the funds of this bank, which as you know are carried to the vaults of the Mercantile Deposit Co., each afternoon at 4:10. Will you kindly let me have fifty men in citizens' clothes, one hour before that time?" JAMES BROWNELL,
Pres. American National Bank.

Just after the dinner hour several large crates were carried into the bank, and Clarence Brownell and Andy McDowell, in the seclusion of a back room, unpacked them and disclosed the exact duplicates of the leather-covered strong boxes that were accustomed to make the daily pilgrimage.

"Do you know anything about laughing gas?" asked the young man as he helped Andy pass the familiar leather-covered chain through the handles.

"It has been used frae time long ago to put a mon to the sleep when th' teeth are pulled," replied Andy in his broad Scotch.

"Yes, that's true. It is one of the best and safest anesthetics. But do you know how it gets its name?"

"No. I canna say that."

"Sometimes if a man is very strongly excited when he takes it, instead of putting him to sleep it seems to increase the excitement. If he is moaning, it makes him shriek in fright; if he is giggling hysterically, it sets him to howling with laughter."

Andy expressed his surprise appropriately and finished the task at which he was engaged by fastening a stout fine cord to one of the strong boxes. "Noo, boy," he said. "'Tis done. I hope ta tricks will be the snarin' o' them. But in ony case, we will na let them s'ip awa'."

At exactly ten minutes after four McDowell appeared in the doorway of the Boreel building. This was the signal for the policeman who has charge of that crossing to halt all traffic. After McDowell came the seven clerks, bearing as usual the leather covered boxes connected by the leather strap. Next came several other clerks carrying the usual extra supply of cases and satchels, and finally the two watchmen.

Everything appeared as usual. But an initiated observer would have seen that one of the extra satchels had a small perforation in the side and the cord all ready to unwind from the reel inside was fastened to the string of treasure boxes. Suddenly McDowell, whose watchful eye had been covertly searching the windows on both sides of the street, shouted, "Look out!"

A grapnel hook at the end of a heavy rope swung from the sky above, straight toward the human caravan. With one accord the clerks dropped their burden, and sprang out of harm's way. There was a cry from the spectators on all sides. The hook engaged the chain, and next instant a half million in treasure was disappearing skyward before the eyes of the multitude that swarmed on Broadway, the busiest street in the world.

Then followed five minutes of the most tremendous excitement. For perhaps three seconds the string of boxes was in sight before it disappeared like a flash over the roof cornice of the Equitable building. Old McDowell drew a red handkerchief from his pocket and waved it frantically. Policemen in citizens' clothes came running from all directions, and others appeared in office windows in the various surrounding buildings, and at various elevations. The clerk who held the satchel containing the reel of cord shouted, "They've stopped."

Andy looked. The cord was no longer unrolling. He followed the string with his eye as far as he could toward the roof of the Equitable. Then with a score of men, Clarence Brownell among them, he rushed into the building for an elevator. In a twinkling they had reached the top floor and started for the stairway to the loft. McDowell's quick eye caught the color of the twine. "There it is," he shouted. "Back! Follow it down the corridor."

Most of the men raced off, guided by the cord, but Clarence bounded on upstairs to the loft. The steps were dented and hacked by the iron boxes that had just been dragged down them. In the loft, hidden by some rough crates, he found a small but powerful electric motor bolted into position, a windlass with several hundred feet of cable wound up, and an ugly looking grapnel anchor. The steps up to the roof were also hacked and gouged, and to make assurance doubly sure, the tell-tale cord led straight up and across the open space to the cornice.

He ran back down stairs to find Andy McDowell and all his assistants gathered silently around a door at the farthermost end of the corridor. The guiding cord ran under this door.

From the other side came a most distracting uproar. Two voices were raised high in clamor. One wailed and wept and boohoo'd; the other ha-ha'd, and whooped with laughter. Clarence understood it instantly but the policemen stared at the door as though they feared the presence of the evil one. Presently an ax was brought and the door was burst in. Grovelling on the floor and shrieking in despair was John Simms, and lying back in a chair in a paroxysm of ghastly mirth was Alec Du Tosc—two of the most notorious brokers and stock speculators on the street. In a heap on the floor between the two men were the leather-covered boxes, badly scarred and scuffed, but still held together by the chain. One of these was wide open, and it was from this that the sweetish-scented gas was pouring.

After the windows had been opened, the police entered and carried the anesthetized men down to the street, whence they were quickly shipped to the Tombs.

Among the first callers at the prison the next morning were Andy McDowell in company with Clarence Brownell. Alec DuTosc, devil-may-care as ever, greeted them from behind the bars, and when he had heard how the string of iron boxes he had so cleverly filched up from the street below had contained nothing but compressed laughing gas, he chuckled heartily over the trick and complimented the boy for his ingenuity.

"I would like to know, though," he added, "where the boodle was all night."

"Last nocht," answered McDowell ruefully, as he thought of the sleep lost by the president, the cashier and himself, "the American National Bank never quit at all. Eet wa' anxious to be ready to do business wi' its coostomers the first thing the mornin'."

How 'Squire Hawkins Enforced the Law.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY ROBERT B. BUCKHAM.

Copyright, 1900, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

WITH the exception of the parson alone, 'Squire Hawkins was by far the most prominent man of the village. He was the Justice of the peace, King's Commissioner, ruling spirit of the town, jailer, town Treasurer, and elder deacon of the church. For years he had been looked upon as in a way the father and wise counsellor of the town. Nothing of any importance in the line of public affairs was ever undertaken without first consulting him, and his word was invariably accepted as law immutable.

Be it said to his credit that he endeavored to fulfill each and every one of his offices with the utmost conscientiousness, however much he may have been in error in good judgment, and strove ever to put to the best advantage for the good of the village, the responsible position which he felt to be his in the community. It was he who fined William Littlefield two shillings for laughing when a stray dog ran into the church during meeting; Jeremiah Simpson four shillings for presuming to sit on the women's side of the meeting house; and Obed Shorey five shillings for absenting himself during the sermon; that thus the dignity of the church might be maintained.

He it was also who proposed and carried through the measure that the church should discard the drum and substitute a bell instead, to summon the people to worship, arguing his case with such warmth and vehemence, increasing the dimensions advocated for it with each new burst of eloquence, and so loudly scoffing at the niggardly spirit of any who would be content with anything less, that when at length the bell was cast, and arrived, it was found to be much too large for the belfry on the meeting house. And it was he, again, who came to the rescue of the people at this trying juncture, and proposed the expedient of hanging the bell in the great pine tree near the meeting house, thus surmounting this difficulty to the complete satisfaction of all.

The day before Christmas of the year 175— brought with it a louder call for the counsels of the 'Squire than any which had preceded it for more than a decade. Never had there been greater excitement rife in the village than on that day, for the public conscience and sense of good taste and decorum of the people had been rudely shocked and sorely disturbed. Some few meddlesome persons of the town, without regard to ancient custom, had petitioned the Selectmen that the great church bell be rung on Christmas eve, in commemoration of the advent of that solemn day.

Such a departure from old time usage had never been suggested before, and called forth no little discussion among the townspeople, until at length a day of public hearing had been appointed. The place of audience was the spacious front room of the residence of Justice Hawkins, the room where the Court of the village was wont to hold its sittings. It was crowded to its utmost capacity on that day with men, women and children; spectators eager to hear and to see what was about to be said and done; while many more stood about without, clamorous for any reports from the more fortunate ones who had succeeded in securing entrance to the building.

With an ardor and zeal which he had never before equalled in his life, 'Squire Hawkins argued the case for the opponents of the petition. "No! The bell should not be rung! What an outrage upon the customs of the fathers to as much as suggest such a thing! Never did they suffer the advent of Christmas to be celebrated or recognized in any way. Never would they have countenanced such a ridiculous proceeding; and never would he! No! Before he would permit the ringing of the bell on that evening, he would take the law into his own hands! Let anyone but dare to touch the rope, to set its tongue agoing, and he himself would punish him. Yes, without mercy, and with a terrible chastisement!" and the speaker brought his heavy cane down upon the floor with a thud which carried conviction with his hearers. "No," was the vote of Selectmen, and the petition was dismissed.

Now among the listeners in the court room was the demure and comely widow Langmaid, and as the 'Squire was himself a widower and sometimes thought of taking unto himself a second wife, what more natural than that being by no means out of sorts with the success of the day, he should have greeted her cheerily, and walked home with her through the throng of admiring onlookers; and even staid to tea with her, when so warmly urged to do so, as well as for some little time after.

In fact, it was late in the night before the Justice started for home again; very late, as well as very cold, and for these reasons he determined to try a short cut home through the woods, rather than go around by way of the road. Traveling through the forest he found to be comparatively easy, in spite of the fact that the snow was deep and that it was much darker under the shadow of the evergreens than out in the moonlit clearings; and the Justice was about congratulating himself that he was to reach home safely and speedily, when chancing to turn about and glance behind him, he beheld a sight which chilled him to the very marrow with abject terror. A dark, shaggy beast, with glittering eyes and fangs which glistened savagely even in the dim light of the woods, was stealthily following after him! A wolf! Doubtless more were close at hand! And with a leap the midnight traveler started for the open at the top of his speed.

No precaution was neglected by the fleeing magistrate to prevent his coming off winner in the race for life which he realized he must now run with the bloodthirsty fiends behind him. He threw aside his great coat, his cane, his periwig, even his silver mounted snuff box, that he might not be hampered by them in his flight. Headlong he plunged through the timber, crashing through underbrush and deadwood heedless of the havoc which it wrought with his fine clothing and silk stockings, his very best, donned in honor of the day's event.

But the open was gained at last, and right before the fugitive lay the meeting house. Ah, if he could but reach it he would be safe; yet as he drew near it occurred to him with overwhelming dismay that, after all, in no possible manner could he gain its interior, for its door was securely locked. But there was the pine tree, just beyond, the cleats nailed to it forming a convenient ladder to its very top! He could ascend that!

With an agility that would have aroused the envy of many a nimble schoolboy, the King's Commissioner ascended the tree, and having perched himself securely upon a stout limb, stopped at last to rest and catch his breath. For the time being, at least, he was out of danger; but a new source of anxiety loomed up before him as he sat upon his elevated perch, now and then casting an anxious look down at his fierce pursuer sitting stubbornly at the base of the tree, ever and again licking its great chops and whining mournfully, as though in rage and disappointment at this unexpected postponement of its feast.

Without coat or hat, as he was, and bathed in perspiration with the alarm and exertions of the past few moments, the shivering prisoner began to feel most severely the effects of the biting and intense cold of the winter's night. It soon became evident to him that if help did not come to his rescue speedily, he must inevitably become so benumbed with the cold as to be unable to maintain his seat longer, and drop to the ground below to become the prey of the glaring monster seated there.

What was he to do? No one would be passing at that hour of the night, for all were at home and in bed. Even if he should shout for help at the top of his lungs he would not be heard, so great was the distance to the nearest house. As he was thus sitting in a state of awful suspense and anxiety, meditating upon the terrible fate to which he seemed doomed, suddenly there swept over him, like a great flood of emotion, a realization of a possible means of escape, thrilling him to the fingertips with a great tide of renewed hope and unspeakable joy. He could ring the church bell in the tree! That, surely, would attract some one to his relief.

And so it did. For a few moments after the clear tones of the bell rang out upon the crisp, frosty air, the silence of the night remained unbroken; then many indistinguishable and indescribable sounds began to float to the ear of the eager listener, portentous of some mighty disturbance away in the distance; and a little after, a great, black throng of individuals came hurrying from all quarters, shouting to one another in excited tones, and pushing and jostling one another in their haste to gain the lead.

Again and again the Justice heard his name sounded above the din. "'Squire Hawkins! Where is he? Wait for him! Wait! Wait! Let him administer the punishment." But nothing could stay the fury of the rabble. On it came like a mighty deluge, sweeping along with irresistible momentum, and surrounded the tree in a twinkling. Then followed a shower of snowballs and dead branches directed at the luckless individual in the tree, amid many bitter threats and loud cries of "Come down! Come down, you rascal!"

The besieged magistrate, unable to make himself heard above the noise, found it necessary to speedily descend in order to save himself from serious injury. But no sooner had his feet touched the ground than he was seized by a score of hands, from behind and before, and given such a shaking and kicking and cuffing as he had never before dreamed of in his life. Indeed, it would be difficult to state what might not have happened, had not some strong lunged individual cried out, "Hold! It is 'Squire Hawkins himself! Come to think of it, I saw his dog sitting under the tree as we came up!"

The crowd stood back aghast. Explanations were offered, but were received with no little incredulity on the part of the villagers, who finally returned in silent awe and wonder to their homes and their beds. It was many a day before the unwonted incident ceased to be the main topic of conversation throughout the village, and the strangest part of it all was that thereafter, when any one wished the bell rung, on Christmas eve, or New Year's eve, or at any time whatever, it was done without as much as consulting the Selectmen; and curiously enough, without a single word of remonstrance from 'Squire Justice Hawkins, the King's Commissioner.

A BIG MAN WITH A BABY'S STOMACH.

A SPECTACLE WHICH IS NOT UNCOMMON IN THE AMERICAN HOME.

He lives on crackers and milk, baby's food. He has a baby's stomach. Give meat to a baby and it will probably be thrown into convulsions. If this man eats meat he suffers agony. He can only eat baby foods, "spoon victuals."

This is the story of the man with a baby's stomach.

He was once a hearty eater. He could eat anything. And he did. He ate by the clock, regardless of the necessities of nutrition. He rushed through breakfast to get to business. He hustled through lunch because of business.

He went home at night, tired out, to eat a heavy dinner, which his stomach was entirely unfit to take care of.

Then came a time when his stomach seemed unduly distended after he had eaten a meal. There were bitter eructations and belchings; a constant feeling of discomfort, and sometimes a dull pain in the stomach. Somebody told him to take some sort of tablets or drops after each meal. He tried it and it eased him. The gas didn't trouble him so much and his stomach wasn't so uncomfortable. He thought it was all right to mix meals and medicine, and did it regularly. But presently other symptoms appeared. He grew nervous, sleepless, irritable. His skin was dry and harsh. His liver didn't act. His heart troubled him, his kidneys were out of order. He had miserable headaches.

Then he began to doctor. He doctored for his liver; for his heart; for his kidneys; for his nerves.

Then the doctors gave him up, and he gave up the doctors.

That is one half of the story. Here's the other half in

THE MAN'S OWN WORDS.

"About ten years ago I began to have trouble with my stomach," writes Mr. Wm. Conolly, of 535 Walnut St., Lorain, Ohio. "It got so bad that I had to lay off quite often two and three days in a week, my stomach would bloat, and I would belch up gas, and was in awful distress at such times. I have employed and been treated by the best doctors in this city, but got no help whatever. Some said I had cancer of the stomach, others catarrh, others dyspepsia. I have bought and tried everything I saw advertised for dyspepsia and stomach trouble, but continued to get worse all the time. About twelve months ago I was in such a condition that my friends had some fear about my recovering. I called a doctor and he found me in a very bad shape. Hands and limbs were cold and dripping with cold sweat. He told me that I had a very bad case of chronic indigestion. I was under his treatment until this spring (1898), but did not improve any. By some way or other I happened to get hold of a vial of your Pellets, and I thought they helped me. It was then I wrote to you for advice. You told me that by my symptoms you thought I had liver complaint and advised the use of your Golden Medical Discovery and Pleasant Pellets in connection. These medicines I have taken as directed and am very happy to state that I commenced to get better from the start, and have not lost a day this summer on account of my stomach. I feel tip-top, and better than I have for ten years."

If that history of one man's suffering and cure teaches anything, it teaches this:

There is no need to suffer with "weak" stomach and the score of ills it causes.

Because:

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures diseases of the stomach and organs of digestion and nutrition. It has cured thousands of men and women whose cases were like that of Mr. Conolly. It has cured "weak" heart, "weak" liver, "weak" lungs, "weak" nerves, and every other kind of weakness which can have its origin in a "weak" stomach. It cures through the stomach the ailments which have their origin in a diseased condition of the stomach and organs of digestion and nutrition.

A WORD FROM A WOMAN.

"I had suffered from indigestion, and only those who have suffered from it know what it really is," writes Mrs. M. J. Fagan, of 1613 East Genessee St., Syracuse, N. Y. "I had had severe attacks of headache and dizziness, with cold hands and feet; everything I ate distressed me, bowels were constipated and I was growing thin and nervous. I cannot express the bad feelings I had when I commenced taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. I took nine bottles of the 'Discovery' and have taken several bottles of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. I commenced feeling better with the first bottle and kept on improving. Now I am so greatly improved in health my friends often speak of it. I most heartily recommend these medicines to all suffering as I was. I received more benefit from them than any other medicine used."

When the stomach and organs of digestion and nutrition are diseased the natural result is to cut down the nutrition of the body. Just as much food may be eaten, but it's not the food eaten but the food digested and assimilated which keeps the body strong. When the stomach is "weak" it's like any weak thing; it can only do weak work. The full strength of the stomach equals the full strength of the whole body. Cut down the strength of the stomach, weaken the powers of digestion and assimilation, and by as much as the stomach is weakened by so much the whole body is weakened. But as this whole body is made of parts, so this "weakness" is distributed over these several parts, heart, lungs, liver, kidneys, nerves, blood, etc.

When "Golden Medical Discovery" cures the "weak" stomach it necessarily cures the weakness of other organs which have been dragged down by the weakness or disease of the stomach and the associated organs of digestion and nutrition. That is why diseases of lungs, liver, heart, kidneys, nerves and blood are cured by "Golden Medical Discovery."

The remarkable cures effected by the use of "Golden Medical Discovery" warrant the hope of a cure in any similar case. No matter how many doctors have failed, or how many medicines have been taken in vain, there is hope for everybody who begins the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It always helps. It almost always cures.

There is no alcohol contained in the "Discovery" and it is altogether free from opium, cocaine and all other narcotics.

Sick people are invited to consult Dr. Pierce, by letter, free. All correspondence strictly private and sacredly confidential. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

The dealer who tries to sell any substitute for "Golden Medical Discovery" is the customer's enemy. He is willing to risk the health of his customer for the sake of larger profit paid by less reliable remedies. For health's sake insist on having Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery.

WHAT'S 21 CENTS?

Not much, certainly. Its purchasing power is not large in the open market. But 21 cents converted into one-cent stamps will pay the expense of mailing Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser, the foremost medical work of the age. There's no other charge. The book is given away. Last year it cost $25,000.00 to give this book to all who paid mailing expenses. THE HERMIT'S RUSE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY ROBERT SEAVER.

Copyright, 1900, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

BILLY and I had decided to take our vacation trip on our wheels. We had no definite destination in view and decided to go where we chose, spend the night wherever we happened to be, in a farm-house, perhaps, or in a barn or hayfield, if no better accommodations offered. The third day out we had ridden until late in the evening without coming to any dwelling when we came in sight of a comfortable-looking farm-house.

It was a large white house, evidently built in Colonial days, and though then, no doubt, a fine mansion was now rather dilapidated and neglected in appearance. Billy rested his wheel against the fence and strode up the weed-grown walk, to where a light shone in the kitchen window.

His knock was answered by a little, white-haired old gentleman, who seemed extremely glad to see us. He welcomed us both as if we had been old friends, and invited us into the kitchen where he presented us to his wife, a dear old motherly lady, who won my heart at once by setting out some fresh doughnuts and new milk.

We became very sociable. Mr. Wilson, we learned, had been a doctor in a near-by town, but failing health and eyesight had decided him to go back to the occupation of his boyhood years, and so he had bought this place a few weeks before, where he and his wife expected to end their days in peace.

We had asked merely for refreshment when we knocked at the door of the farm-house. When now, after regaling ourselves, we broached the subject of spending the night, Doctor Wilson looked uneasily at his wife—talked with her a minute in a low tone and then said:

"Excuse me, friends, if I have hesitated about answering you. You are very welcome here, if you can stand it. The fact is—now don't think me foolish—that this house is haunted."

"Oh!" we both laughed.

"Great scheme," said Billy. "One more adventure added to our list. By Jove, Doctor, that beats the supper. I've never slept in a haunted house but I'll be glad enough to try it."

"Don't be too sure, my boy," said the doctor. "Wait till morning before you talk that way. When I bought this place it had been vacant for two years and it has had a dozen owners in the last five years. Nobody ever went near it. I felt as you do, then, but I'll confess, after what I've heard for the past two weeks I may have to move out after all. It's absurd, I know, but that's the way the matter stands."

Assuring our host that all the ghosts in the country couldn't rouse us, Dr. Wilson showed us to a neat little room and left us. We were not long in getting to bed and, tired out, fell asleep at once. The next thing I knew I felt Billy grip my arm. "Listen," he said; and wide awake we listened to the weirdest collection of moans and shrieks I have ever heard. They seemed to come from first one side of the room and then the other. Sleep was out of the question and we lay awake and shivered for the rest of the night. The next morning we found that the doctor and his wife had also been disturbed; in fact, Mrs. Wilson was on the verge of nervous prostration.

After breakfast we bade our hosts adieu and went our way. The night's adventure had made a strong impression on me and I decided to go back to the Wilsons and try to solve the mystery. Billy had had enough, and declined to go back.

"I believe old Wilson is a fraud," he said, "and put up a game on us. You can go ghost-chasing if you want, but I won't."

So we parted company and I rode back to the Wilsons', arriving the following morning. I found that there had been no disturbance the night before, which rather strengthened my impression that Billy was right and that the doctor was making a fool of us. Besides, a ghost is never as real by daylight, and by noon I had almost decided to ride off and forget the matter. That morning, with the doctor, I had examined the old house as thoroughly as possible, and had explored every nook for some solution of the mystery, but without result; nothing had been discovered. In the afternoon the doctor and I had visited the attic, which we found littered with all the odds and ends that accumulate in old houses. Not worth moving, they had probably been untouched since the house was built. I was delighted—I had forgotten my ghost in the zest of looking over these old things, which the doctor gave me the privilege of examining while he went to attend to his work about the place. An old hair-cloth trunk attracted my attention. It opened easily and I found it stuffed full of old papers and letters. These I examined with idle curiosity, finding besides family letters, old mortgages and deeds, a lieutenant's commission in the Colonial army, a copy of a royal proclamation, and then, way at the bottom, an old plan, yellow with age, which I studied, idly at first, then with eager interest, for here I discovered a possible clue to the ghost mystery.

It was a plan of the house and grounds; that I soon discovered. There was writing, too, and after long study I deciphered it and found myself in possession of a clue indeed. The plan was a diagram of the house, sure enough, and showed the secret passages and hiding places that had been built for the purpose of hiding refugees in Revolutionary times. The entrance was from the old well in the back yard. Rushing down stairs I found the doctor and his wife and explained my find. Together we went to the well, which had not been used for years. I descended, and after going about ten feet discovered a dark passage or tunnel, at right angles to the side of the well and leading toward the house, just large enough to allow a man to crawl through. This I followed until I came to a very narrow and steep flight of stairs, scarcely a foot wide. These led up to the wall of the house, I decided; then a narrow passage through which I slipped sideways, and another flight of steps like the first. The dust and heat were suffocating, but a little light filtered in under the eaves.

Without waiting further I retraced my steps to the well, where I found the doctor and his wife anxiously waiting. I told them of my discovery, and we decided upon a plan of action. Ghosts no longer bothered us—our idea now was to catch the flesh and blood ghost that had made all the trouble. We soon decided on a plan—simply to hide and catch the intruder when he entered the passage. That night I hid in the barn and was rewarded about midnight by seeing a man creep up through the field opposite the house. He entered the well, and then in a few minutes I heard the groans and cries that had so disturbed my peace of mind two nights before. After a time the noises ceased and I ran out and crouched beside the well. The doctor, according to agreement, slipped out of the house and joined me. In a few minutes we could hear our man creeping through the tunnel; then as soon as he appeared at the brink of the well I sprang upon him, and soon we had him tied securely, though he struggled desperately.

We carried him into the kitchen, where we discovered our prisoner was a very distinguished looking, if somewhat dilapidated old gentleman, a veritable blue-blood dressed in the style of seventy years ago, and though rambling and incoherent in his speech, evidently a man of education and refinement. At first he declined to tell his story, but at length on our assuring him that we would let him go if he would tell us his object in playing ghost, he explained his motive.

Long ago, he said, his family had owned the property, but had been cheated out of their possession and title by another branch, through a forged will. His father had left him, among other papers, a plan of the secret passages with which the house was honeycombed, and the idea had seized him to play ghost and frighten away the usurping occupants of his ancestral home. His plan had succeeded—the property had passed from one hand to another, losing value with every transfer, and each time he had succeeded in scaring away the owners who would then sell—for any price, to get the property off their hands. While the house was unoccupied he had lived in the attic, scaring away the passers-by with ghostly noises. While the house was occupied, the "ghost" had lived in a little hut on the side of the mountain, an eccentric hermit, who aroused the curiosity and fear of the whole neighborhood.

When his story was ended the old hermit broke down and wept bitterly, and so, too, to tell the truth, did Mrs. Wilson.

* * * * * *

The Wilsons still have their ghost, but he occupies the room Billy and I had, and never groans in the night unless, perchance, he indulges too freely in the toothsome, but sometimes indigestible dainties with which the doctor's wife heaps his plate.

THE SHERIFF'S MISTAKE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY FREDERICK E. BURNHAM.

Copyright, 1900, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

HORSE thieves and desperadoes had made matters lively at Preston for several months. More acts of lawlessness had been perpetrated within six months than during any two years previous. As a natural result every stranger was eyed with more or less suspicion until he gave satisfactory evidence that he was an honest man.

One evening late in the fall of '89, word was passed from mouth to mouth to the effect that a disreputable looking negro was somewhere within the limits of the township, and in a very short space of time a searching party had been organized and a hundred or more were shortly scouring the country about, searching for the negro, whose only crime(?) so far as they knew, was the wearing of ragged garments.

A little after ten o'clock the negro was located, asleep in a deserted barn.

"Wha' yir doin', sah?" demanded the negro, aroused from his slumbers.

"Wha' the matter?"

"We'll show you what's the matter, you black devil," said the man who had seized him. "Who have you robbed, hey?"

"Robbed?" queried the darky, "I ain't robbed nobody."

"What have you got in there?"

The negro had made a movement with his hand toward the lining of his coat.

"Nothin', sah! Nothin', sho's yo born!"

One of the men stripped the coat off with a vicious jerk—and received the negro's great fist fairly between the eyes. For an instant the darky jabbered wildly, the while clinging tightly to his coat.

"Yo leave dat coat 'lone, sah. I robbed nobody. Leave dat coat 'lone——'or, Sah-h-h!"

The man's cries were cut short.

Out upon the barnfloor fell a worn money-pouch. It had dropped from the lining of the negro's coat.

"Not robbed anybody, eh?" said one of the men. "It looks like it. Look at the bills, boys. He's the man we're looking for. Get the noose ready and we'll make short work of him. Parker is two miles from here and if he was only a hundred rods he'd leave us alone."

At the name of Parker the negro brightened up.

"That's the man, sah, I was lookin' fo.' I was carryin' de money to him. I come from 'Frisco foot, one—two t'ousand mile to guv' it into his hands."

The crowd roared with merriment.

"Come to see the sheriff with the money you'd stole. You're a cool one and no mistake!"

Unknown to the mob, one of the men slipped out of the barn and a moment later was riding at breakneck speed toward the sheriff's house.

"Stave it off as long as you can, John," he had whispered to one of the men, "I'll be back soon. I believe he's telling the truth."

The sheriff angrily asked what was wanted at that hour of the night.

"There's a mob down in the Hollow and they are about to string up a negro. He says that he has got something to give you—a money-pouch that dropped out of his coat. Ride for all you're worth, Parker, and I'll be on hand with one or two others to help you."

The sheriff banged the window, grumbling the while. Hurry? Hardly! He took little stock in the man's words, but would go, nevertheless, merely to ease the minds of certain individuals in the town who were opposed to lynchings. As far as he was concerned, the mob had his hearty consent.

Meanwhile, matters were progressing at the barn in the Hollow, though somewhat tardily, owing to the entreaties of the man whom the messenger had asked to stave off the execution.

"Hear his side of the story," said he, turning to the negro, "there is time enough. What have you got to say for yourself, nigger? How did you come by the money! Speak out."

"It was this way, sah;" replied the negro, loosening the cord about his throat, "I wuked 'long side a man in de mines whose name was Parker; some called him Jim, others, Bill; I dunno which it was. Six months ago he tuk sick an' died, and afore he guv up he handed me dis yere bag of money, sayin' as how it was to go to a man here in dis state by de name of Parker; might have been his father or brudder, I dunno 'bout dat; he tole me, too, but I's forgot, and I's been trampin' round tryin' to find a 'Parker' as knowed a Jim or a Bill Parker."

"A good story, nigger," said one of the men, "but it don't go down with us. Say your prayers and be quick about it, for your neck is going to be stretched."

"I's tellin' de truth, sho as I's born, sah," said the negro, his black skin taking on a grayish tinge. "I's tellin' de truth, sah, sho——sho——"

There was an ominous silence, and then the clatter of hoofs in the street.

The negro slipped his hand into his pocket and produced a ring.

"Marse Parker'd know this if——"

The words were cut short. Some one had kicked the box from under the negro's feet and the noose tightened. An instant later the body swung limply from the rafter.

Even as it was done the mob scattered and when the sheriff with two others pushed open the door, there was no sign of the rabble, save the apparently lifeless body of the negro.

The sheriff saw an object on the floor that glittered in the rays of the lantern, and he stooped to pick it up.

It was a plain gold ring. On the inside was engraved the letters, "J. W. P.—from Cynthia."

The sheriff staggered back, his eyes starting from their sockets. With a hoarse cry he called upon his companions to cut down the body. As the body was laid on the floor the negro's eyes rolled and the thick lips moved convulsively.

Somehow in that moment of consciousness the negro learned that before him was the man whom he had sought. That he did, is one of the unaccountable facts which we are obliged to face sometimes in our lives. In the hour of death a keener perception is often accorded mortals.

"Marse Parker," said the negro feebly, "Marse Parker, Jim tole me to brung yo a bag o' money for to square up 'bout a hoss he done let get killed. I's trabbled on foot from 'Frisco an' was jist goin' to guv it to yo, but some one has tuk it from me."

The negro's mind wandered for a moment and his hand sought his pocket.

"I had—a—a ring what his sister done guv him once, but somehow I done lost dat too, Marse Parker. I guess p'raps——p'raps I——dropped——dropped——"

The negro gasped and all was over.

The morning sun was streaming into the deserted barn in the Hollow. Sheriff Parker was kneeling by the side of the negro, his hands clasping the negro's great palms. He had asked again and again for more tidings of the boy who had left home ten years previous—he had asked, but the negro's lips were mute.

The Hero of Aqua Fria Camp.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY E. BOURDON WILSON.

Copyright, 1900, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

I HAVE to laugh whenever I think of Billy as he looked one Sunday morning, his face was so human—comically human—in appearance. He was seated dog-fashion on the ground beside a group of ten men, wearing an old felt hat that hid his horns and made his forehead seem broad and high; his "whiskers" had been carefully combed to make him look like a gray-bearded man; and he held the stem of a clay pipe in his mouth, though, to his credit, he was not smoking. His large eyes were bright with intelligence, and as solemn as a judge's; and but for his nose being a little long, he would have been quite as human in appearance as some men I have known.

What was Billy? A goat—a big Mexican goat, the leader of the mule-herd, and the pet and hero of every man in camp.

I was a contractor when I owned him, back in 1882, and I was engaged in grading a railroad in Northern Mexico, employing about fifty men and a hundred mules. The part of Mexico we were in, was, and is yet as for that matter, a desolate region of bare, rocky mountains, and treeless plains, the want of rain making it a desert. There is, however, a short season in the fall when rain falls almost continuously, and then the short prairies quickly clothe themselves with a growth of grass; this reaches a height of about six inches before the moisture is exhausted, then dries, curling into feed every bit as nutritious for stock as the best timothy hay. It was my custom to send the mules at night, in the charge of a herder, to graze on this grass; in some respects mules are silly creatures, however; they readily stampede, a flash of lightning or clap of thunder, or the howling of a coyote often being sufficient to send them galloping madly away; while the cry of a mountain lion, or the sight of a band of antelopes is sure to give them a fright from which they do not recover until exhausted with running. So, to prevent such stampedes, I bought Billy and installed him as leader of my herd.

How can a goat prevent stampedes? Put one with a herd of mules and he will at once fraternize with them, they never attempting to harm him as they would a calf or other small animal; and they soon come to regard him as their leader, one in whose wisdom they trust implicitly. Even though badly scared themselves, they will not run away and leave him; and as goats are not easily frightened, and cannot run far if frightened, the value of such a leader in an open country can easily be estimated.

When I moved into the country to go to work, I established my camp near a spring called Aqua Fria (Cold Water); this spring gushed out from beneath a spur of a range of wild, rugged mountains that stretched away northward farther than the eye could reach. A level prairie lay in every other direction, affording convenient pasturage. We had been at work less than a month when the herder reported one morning that one of the mules was missing; and it seemed that he had strayed away from the herd during the night, but we thought it strange that he should leave Billy. Knowing that domestic animals seldom wander far from man in a desert country, expecting the missing mule soon to return to camp of his own accord, I made no effort to find him. The night following another one disappeared, but still I was not alarmed; nevertheless, as every mule was needed to work, I took the precaution of sending two men with the herd the next night. In spite of this it was found the next morning that still another mule was gone.

Even yet I felt no fear as to the ultimate recovery of the missing mules, but, as they were needed every day, I sent out mounted men to hunt for them; they found no trace of them, however, and aroused at last, I ordered that the remaining animals, with the exception of Billy and El Sabio (The Wise One), a shaggy little donkey who was kept hobbled to prevent his wandering, be kept haltered to the feed-rope at night. This ended the loss of the mules, but a few mornings later some of the men reported that their tents had been robbed during the night.

In such a country as we were in, where the necessaries of life command exorbitant prices, or are unobtainable, the loss of such articles as were stolen, blankets and clothing, is a serious one; and the men would have executed summary justice upon the thief had he fallen into their hands. There was nothing to lead to the identification of the guilty one, however, and the men went to their work casting dark looks at one another, each half suspecting his neighbor.

The following morning one of the men failed to report for work; and going to his tent to see if he were sick, I was horrified to find him lying there, dead, a great knife wound in his side. Instantly the camp became the scene of great excitement; the men refused to go to work, and, buckling on their revolvers, gathered in groups to discuss the one theme of conversation. That night they took turns at guarding the camp, and they saw nothing moving except El Sabio hobbling about, nevertheless another man was murdered before morning.

Who was the assassin? and what was his motive? were questions asked on every hand. Quickly the men wrought themselves into a frenzy of excitement and fear; and recalling the silly story of a Mexican, which was to the effect that the spring was haunted by a demon of horrible appearance, who killed and robbed all who came in his way, and without fear of detection, he having the power to make himself invisible, the superstitious ones at once ascribed the constantly recurring crimes to supernatural agencies. They would have deserted me in a body had I not called them about me, and, ridiculing their fears, plead with them to remain another twenty-four hours, proposing a plan by which I hoped to catch the murderer.

"Let every man go to his tent to-night as though nothing had happened," I said, "and placing himself so that he can see every part of the tent, pretend to sleep, but keep his eyes open and his finger on the trigger of his revolver and fire without hesitation at anything he may see moving."

With some murmuring on the part of the more fearful ones they finally consented to remain; and, as I hoped the next night passed without incident, as did the next and the next. A week went by and the men becoming reassured, had returned to work, when about two o'clock one morning, the camp was aroused by a scream that was followed closely by a succession of shots. Springing to my feet and hurrying in the direction whence came the sounds, I met a man who cried out to me that he had been attacked and wounded by the mysterious assassin. Taking him to my tent and making a light, I found the blood streaming from a gash in his side; but, fortunately for him, the wound was a slight one and the flow of blood was quickly staunched.

He had heard a faint sound in his tent, he said, but being very drowsy did not open his eyes until something touched him, and then he turned to grab his revolver. This movement saved his life, for at that moment he felt a glancing blow and the sting of the knife in his side. He screamed and began firing and a dark figure darted out of the tent. As soon as he could get to his feet he also ran out, but saw no moving thing except El Sabio, who was hobbling by not far away.

There was no more sleep for any one in camp that night and I fully expected every man to leave with the coming of day. Some of them did propose to go but to my surprise, the wounded man insisted that all remain so that he could discover who had wounded him, and avenge the deed. Two nights now passed peaceably, every man watching alertly. On the third night I lay in my tent, looking out through a small opening in the rear, when, about midnight, I saw El Sabio hobbling toward me; there was no moon but the stars afforded sufficient light for me to see clearly. As I carelessly observed the donkey, Billy came trotting up to him to rub noses, but stopped just before their noses touched and began backing away; then he paused, and lowering his head charged down on El Sabio at full speed.

The donkey saw him coming and started to wheel, but was too slow and Billy's head struck him in the side, knocking him over; and as often as he would try to regain his feet Billy would rear up and knock him down again. The two had always been on the best of terms and I was at a loss to understand Billy's behavior, but not for long; as I watched, a tawny human hand, gripping a long-bladed knife, stole out from somewhere about the donkey and struck at Billy. Instantly I leaped to my feet and rushing out of my tent, opened fire with my revolver upon the donkey. The effect was instantaneous and startling: with a savage yell the donkey's skin burst and was thrown aside, revealing a hideously painted Apache Indian, who sprang erect and started running. He did not take a dozen steps before a shot from my revolver brought him down, and some of the men running up overpowered him and tied him hand and foot.

Even had I wished to do so I could not have restrained the men. They hurried to where a wagon stood and raising the tongue erect, propping it securely, passed a rope through the ring at its end and strung the Indian up. His death was but just punishment for his crimes. Disguised in a donkey's skin (not El Sabio's, as we quickly learned), he had been wandering at will about the camp, and watching his opportunity would steal into a tent to kill and rob. The next day we found a cave in the mountains, wherein were stored all of the stolen things and not far from that we found the missing mules.

And that is how Billy came to be the hero of Aqua Fria Camp.

Some Stories About Mr. Moody.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY MAX B. THRASHER.

THOSE who knew the late D. L. Moody only as a preacher, and from his printed sermons, can never fully realize the wonderful power of the man. The choicest thoughts of his heart, his most striking utterances, came spontaneously to his lips and were dashed out with prodigal lavishness in the course of his evangelical work, to have no printed record unless it might happen to be in some newspaper report of the services. During the series of meetings which Mr. Moody conducted in Tremont Temple in Boston, early in 1897, the last great series of services which he ever conducted in New England, I reported him for one of the Boston daily papers, twice a day for two months. I have been looking over my note books of that time and in them find set down many of the things which impressed me most deeply at the time.

Mr. Moody was one of the best story tellers I ever knew. He had great dramatic ability, in this way, and used it repeatedly to illustrate his arguments. One of the best stories I heard him tell was about "Lady Pendulum."

This was a woman who came to Mr. Moody's services in one of the cities of England. She was a person of wealth and importance, evidently, but lame, as she was brought into the meetings in a chair by her footman and placed in the aisle directly in front of the pulpit.

"As I watched her through the service," said Mr. Moody, "I could see an expression of disgust come over her face, and when the service was over I heard her say to her footman impatiently, 'Take me out of here.'

"I said to myself that I would not see her back again, but the next day she was there, and the next, for a week, and finally she had her chair brought into the after-meeting which followed the regular service. When I saw her there I went to speak to her. She said: 'Mr. Moody, you've got something which I have not.'

"I said: 'If you haven't got the love of the Lord Jesus Christ in your heart, I have.'

"She said: 'You've got rest.'

"Well, it seemed that she wanted to be a Christian, but she said that it was no use; it wouldn't last after I had gone back to America. I talked with her every day for a week, I guess, and it didn't do any good. Finally, one day when I was speaking, and she sat there in her chair in the aisle in front of me, I happened to think of the old story of the pendulum, and used it as an illustration, looking down to her as I spoke. You know the story—how the pendulum of a clock was so discouraged at the number of times it had got to tick in a year, and how it finally was reconciled by remembering that it had to tick only one at a time.

"She did not stay to the after-meeting that day, but some days later I got a letter from her telling me she was so glad that I had used that illustration, because it had made it all plain to her. She was going to trust God to give her grace enough to get along with from day to day, and not worry about the rest.

"'I have bought a clock which shows the pendulum, to remind me of this,' she said, 'and I have talked so much about it that some one has called me "Lady Pendulum."'

"She signed her name to the letter 'Lady Pendulum', and that was the only name I knew her by for a long time. When I was ready to sail for home a box was brought me with a note from her. In the box was a beautiful clock, made so as to show the pendulum, and I have always kept this in my home to remind me of her.

"When I went back to England she was at church to greet me. She was a very wealthy woman, and able to do a great deal of good. I learned while I was there that time that she was keeping her grace alive by supporting several missionaries, and by doing many such things which her wealth made possible."

From a report of a service which Mr. Moody conducted with "Sowing and Reaping" for a subject, I quote these striking words:

"A man reaps what he sows. If he plants onions he doesn't gather wheat. If a man tells his son to go to the door and tell an unwelcome caller that his father is not at home he may expect that boy to lie to him inside of six months. A woman said to me: 'It is so strange we cannot get better servants.' I said: 'Madam, if you tell your maid to lie, and say you are not at home, you must expect her to lie to you.' 'Oh,' said she, 'that's only a society lie.'

"I tell you a society lie is just as bad as any other kind.

"A merchant in Chicago said to me: 'It is strange we cannot get honest clerks.' 'I said to him: 'If merchants tell their clerks to say a thing is all wool when they know it is half cotton, they must expect those clerks will steal.'

"A man reaps what he sows."

Although Mr. Moody's disapproval of the Sunday papers was often vigorously expressed, he thoroughly appreciated the value of the help of the press in general in carrying to hundreds of thousands his words, when otherwise they could have been heard only by hundreds. There were few services in which he failed to speak of this, or to thank God, in his prayer, for the help of the reporters and the papers. His relations with the reporters were always very happy, and he insisted that we be given every facility to do our work. A long table skirted the whole of the platform in Tremont Temple for us; there were always chairs enough for all who might by any chance happen to come in. There might be a hundred persons standing in the auditorium, for want of seats, but our chairs were always reserved for us, a wise provision, since sometimes a man could not come in until after the service had begun. On account of this I had a chance one day to see an interesting incident illustrating Mr. Moody's power over persons who did not expect to be impressed by him.

I had been talking one day about these meetings and Mr. Moody, with Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton, the famous writer and unquestionably one of the most able, as she also is one of the most truly refined women in America. Mrs. Moulton had never seen Mr. Moody. She said she had often thought that she would like to see and hear him, because she had a curiosity to see what there was about a man, so uneducated as she had heard Mr. Moody to be, which people found so impressive.

I proposed that she come to one of the meetings, and she said that she would have done so except that by that time there were such crowds at Tremont Temple every day that one had to go an inconveniently long time before hand in order to get a seat. I told her to come when she could, and come directly up to the press table, to where I sat, and that I would see that she had a seat there. I thought nothing more of it, until, several days later, some one touched me on the shoulder, as I was writing away for dear life, and when I looked around there stood Mrs. Moulton. Fortunately we had plenty of chairs, and she had a good seat, right in front of the speaker. There must have been three thousand persons in the audience, that day, and Mr. Moody surpassed himself. I kept rushing away on the sheets of paper in front of me, for I was making "running copy," until in a moment's let up I happened to look around to Mrs. Moulton. Her eyes, filled with tears, were fixed on Mr. Moody's face with a look which showed that she was oblivious to everything except his words. When the service was over, and she thanked me, she said: "I understand his power, now."

Criticism never seemed to worry Mr. Moody. If anything, it stimulated him to new attacks. I remember once he read aloud a part of a letter which had been sent him, finding fault with something he had said. "If I talk about the sins of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob," he said, "it's all right; and you say, 'They were a bad lot:' but when I get at you for your sins, you don't like it. You say: 'It's too personal.'

"I don't care if people do take issue with what I say. When they get mad it shows that they are waking up. I would rather a man would get mad and go out of the room three times over than to sit there and reply to everything I say: 'That's so, Mr. Moody.' Such a man as that is the most discouraging of any.

"I used to be afraid I would hurt somebody's feelings. I've got over that. I'm afraid now that I won't; for if folks are not living right I want to make them know it."

His criticisms were not all for the laity, by any means. The ministers always got a good share. I find one place, where talking to the ministers who were present he said:

"If a man goes into the pulpit every Sunday and uses it only professionally, and puts no love in it, he might as well buy a tin horn and blow it. What the people want is to be fed, and then they will go to work. If you want a good flock of sheep you feed them well. 'Feed my sheep.' Feed them well, and don't put the fodder too high up in the racks. Sheep haven't got necks like camels. If you want a good church feed it on the word of God."

Coming back to the congregations again, he went on: "We don't want gush and sentiment. When I see a man shouting 'Glory Hallelujah!' and know that he don't treat his wife right, it makes a cold shiver run down my back. If a man has lost his influence in his home he has lost it in the church and in the world. We are to be doers of the Word. Stop and think. Are there any of you who have anything to do in the way of forgiving? Keep thinking. You look rather strange, some of you. It's no use for us to go on unless you are ready to begin at the bottom. Are you ready to forgive?"

The day's talk ended with that sentence. Mr. Moody waited a full minute;—the time, in the deathly still, densely crowded house seemed much longer. I quote one sentence from the prayer with which he closed the service: "As the report of this meeting goes out through the press, may many see and read, and be influenced to go and become reconciled to those from whom they are estranged."

THE PUEBLO SNAKE DANCE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE SNAKE dance of the Pueblo Indians or Moquis, takes place during the month of August. It is the last of a series of religious observances which continue for nine days, and its object is to bring rain.

In the Moquis tribe there are two secret societies, known as the Snakes and Antelopes. Each of these societies is presided over by priests, and it is considered a great honor by the Moquis to belong to either order.

Before the ceremony numbers of snakes are captured and after being washed and covered with sacred meal by the priests, are kept in a safe enclosure.

At the beginning of the ceremony the Antelopes appear, headed by their priests. They march to the enclosure containing the snakes and then circle around it, stamping vigorously to notify the powers that the ceremony is about to begin. Then the Snake fraternity appear and go through the same performance.

Both societies now join in lines facing each other. Then one member of the Snakes and one of the Antelopes run to the enclosure where the priest in authority hands them a snake. This the Snake brother places in his mouth, holding the center of the reptile's body between his teeth, and marches around, the Antelope man meanwhile accompanying him and stroking the snake with a bunch of feathers tied to the end of a wand.

The other members of the societies follow suit and soon each man of the Snake fraternity has one or two reptiles in his mouth and several more in his hands. Now and then one of the snakes, which are principally rattlesnakes, is dropped purposely, and an Indian whose special duty this is, re-captures it. Though the snakes are handled carelessly the performers are rarely bitten, but even in this case, the Moquis possess a powerful antidote for snake bite, so death never results.

While all this is going on the rest of the tribe, both men and women, chant a weird melody. At last all the reptiles are dropped inside a sacred circle marked by the priests. Then the members of the brotherhoods rush in, seize all the reptiles they can carry and run over the plains at full speed, finally letting them go, to carry to the gods the prayers for rain.

The societies on their return bathe in a green fluid, the composition of which is best known to themselves, and then take a powerful emetic to purge themselves from the effects of snake handling. After this has been thoroughly effected they sit down to a kind of communion service of bread given them by the women, and the ceremony is over.

Though all this seems ridiculous as well as somewhat disgusting to us, it must be remembered that to the Indians this rite has the deepest religious significance, and is, on that account, entitled to respect. At the present time the Pueblos have had the advantages of Christian teaching and have abandoned some of their most cruel and religious rites, but they cling to some of their old traditions and among them the Snake dance.

THE latest idea for a dance is a golf cotillion. Golf itself is not to be introduced into the dance, but the girls have planned to use as favors all the necessities for playing the game—golf sticks and golf balls, golf waistcoats, knitted stockings and caps, (which, by the way, are made by the girls themselves,) and golfstick-holders will figure largely, and the dancers will go home laden with a new supply of outfits for their favorite out-of-door game.

Enrich the Blood

Impoverished blood is the secret of half the disease known to humanity—rheumatism, dropsy, stomach and liver trouble, with all their attendant misery, may nine times out of ten be traced to the circulatory system. Correct that and all goes well. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People increase the red corpuscles in the blood and thereby give it new life and richness. They also tone up the nerves and are a specific for many serious disorders.

Mrs. Joseph M. Evans, of Carterville, Mo., says: "Two years ago I had dropsy of the left limb so severely that my physicians said I could not recover. I had been sick about a year, and most of the time was bedfast. The treatment of the physicians did me no permanent good. I steadily grew worse.

"My brother finally insisted that I try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. The first box effected a change for the better in my condition, and I continued to improve steadily.

"I took about six months steady treatment. The result is that I do not now feel a trace of my former ailments."

Asthma Can Be Cured.

Statement of a Noted Physician.

The astonishing statement that Asthma can be cured, coming from so well known an authority as Dr. Rudolph Schiffmann, will be of interest to sufferers from Asthma, Phthisic and Hay Fever. The Doctor's offer, coming as it does from a recognized authority, who during a practice of over 30 years has treated and cured more cases of Asthma and its kindred than any living doctor, is certainly a generous one and an innovation in this age of countless fraudulent nostrums. Believing that the honest way to sell a remedy is to let those who would buy convince themselves of its merits before purchasing, Dr. Schiffmann has authorized this paper to say that he will send a free trial package of his remedy, "Schiffmann's Asthma Cure," to any sufferer who sends his name on a postal card before April 1st. This remedy has cured thousands of cases that were considered incurable. Being used by inhalation it reaches the seat of the disease direct, stops the spasm instantly and insures sweet and refreshing sleep. A free trial package will convince the most skeptical. Those desiring to try a free sample should address Dr. R. Schiffmann, 352 Jackson St., St. Paul, Minn.

FEEL YOUR PULSE

Place your finger on your pulse and see if your heart beats regularly and steadily. If there is a single skipping or irregularity of the beats, your heart is weak or diseased, and there is no telling how soon it will stop beating altogether. Heart troubles, dangerous as they are, can be instantly recognized by all. No doctor can tell better than you if your heart is out of order. But remember that irregular or skipping beats are only one symptom, and in many cases are not found. Any of the following are just as positive and sure:—

Symptoms of Heart Trouble.

Fluttering, Palpitation, Shortness of Breath, Tenderness, Numbness or Pain in the Left Side, Arm or Under the Shoulder Blade; Fainting Spells, Dizziness, Hungry or Weak Spells; Spots Before the Eyes; Sudden Starting in Sleep, Dreaming, Nightmare, Choking Sensation in Throat; Oppressed Feeling in Chest; Cold Hands and Feet; Painful to Lie on Left Side; Drowsy, Swelling of the Feet or Ankles (one of the surest signs), Neuralgia Around the Heart. Persons having even one of these symptoms should not delay treatment a single day.

Medicine Free to All. If you have been treating yourself for stomach, lung, kidney or nervous disease, and have failed to find a cure, the chances are 9 in 10 that your trouble is in your heart. Hundreds of such cases are found every year. I want you to send me your name and address at once, so I can send to you for trial a box of my celebrated Heart Tablets absolutely free of charge, by mail, prepaid. Don't fail to write me if you have a single one of the above symptoms. I can cure you beyond any question, and will send the free tablets to prove it to you personally. Delays are dangerous. Men, Women and Things.

CONDUCTED BY JENNIE MELVENE DAVIS.

The "Amazon of Journalism" is a term that has been applied to Mrs. Frank Leslie. "Napoleonic" is another expression of the fact that a woman has made one of the greatest successes in the history of publishing. The story of Mrs. Leslie's life has all the elements of romance and of plain, practical business life. Mrs. Leslie herself has the dual nature of keen, clear headed executive ability that has enabled her to build up and maintain a great publishing business, and of the charming woman who attracts friends through her own personality. She is of Southern birth, having been born in New Orleans where she received her early education. She is of Huguenot descent and the result of French blood and Southern training may be seen in her manner. Not all the business training and experience nor the hurried rush of New York life has changed the exquisite courtesy or the real femininity of Frank Leslie. She was taught to speak French, Italian and Spanish, and her facility as a linguist has been an element in her great social success abroad. She commenced to write when thirteen years of age. Mrs. Leslie has the rich many sided nature that must of necessity find an outlet in expression, and the name of Miriam Florence was known in the literary world before its young owner became editor of one of Frank Leslie's publications. In a short time she became the wife of the famous publisher. But Mrs. Leslie never ceased to advise with her husband on business matters. She entertained the Emperor and Empress of Brazil at her Saratoga villa "Interlaken" and entertained them with no less a degree of luxury than they were accustomed to. One of Mrs. Leslie's books, From Gotham to the Golden Gate, was written after her trip westward in a special Pullman train that carried many of the staff of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper. These artists and writers filled the pages of the paper with accounts of the journey, but Mrs. Leslie's book has all the finish of a veteran writer and all the keen appreciation of changing scenes of a sympathetic woman. Shortly after this innovation in journalism, Mr. Leslie became involved and was forced to make an assignment. Just as he completed plans for the recovery of his fallen fortunes he died. He asked his wife to carry on his plans. By act of legislature she became "Frank Leslie" and with all the splendid force of the man who had made the name famous and with a keen, aggressive yet conservative determination all her own, she won victory from defeat. Her phenomenal business success is well known. She was able at last to leave her desk with an abundant income and the prospect of leisure. She had leased her Popular Monthly to a syndicate while her other interests were in the Arkell Publishing Company. She was preparing for a lengthy sojourn in Europe, where she numbers among her friends the best known people in public life, when the news of the failure of the Arkell Company came over the telephone. In the moment that a fortune was swept away she called up the "Monthly" and accepted the editorship and presidency of a stock company that was to publish the magazine. Frank Leslie is again actively engaged in the publishing business. She possesses the executive ability to master details and to oversee every department of business coupled with the daring and dash that has enabled her to make lightning decisions. She has the woman's intuition with all the force of a strong business man. So much for Frank Leslie the publisher. Frank Leslie the woman is no less admired by all who come within the influence of her gracious presence. That she is a beautiful woman has been said in almost every language and every newspaper in the world. She is a woman with a kindly word and a helping hand to all women who are making the struggle that she has turned into success. Her beautiful gowns, her jewels and her presence would suggest the lady of fashion; her simple, direct manner and her instant grasp of a situation would suggest the man of affairs; but the expression of her great gray eyes and the sensitiveness of mouth show the true womanly woman. It is as that, that Frank Leslie has won her greatest success.

Edwin Markham is widely known as the author of the poem that has moved the literary world and the great army of thinkers who study the relations of capital and labor. The one poem "The Man With the Hoe", has made its author famous wherever the English language is spoken. The income from the sale of his writings has made Mr. Markham independent. Edwin Markham was born in Oregon City, Oregon, in 1852. While he was still a child his father died and his mother brought up the family. She kept a very successful store in the city and also found time to contribute both prose and poetry to the local papers. When the boy was nine his mother purchased a sheep ranch in Central California and here the boy learned the life of the toiler in the hard struggle of life upon a farm. Before he was fifteen he had written a poem "A Dream of Chaos." He finally made his way through schools and colleges until he became a teacher. He has held various positions as principal and superintendent, for it was not until the last year that he decided to devote himself to literature. For fourteen years the thought of the celebrated poem was with him. Millet's picture "The Man With the Hoe" suggested to Mr. Markham the idea of the poem. The poem was completed on New Year's Day, 1899. It was first published in the San Francisco Examiner. Its success was instantaneous and phenomenal. Mr. Markham has been hailed as the future poet of America. He lives at present in Washington, D. C.. and he is much in demand as a lecturer. The task of living up to the reputation he so suddenly achieved is no small one, but those who know Mr. Markham believe that he is capable of sustained and remarkable work.

The Countess Schimmelmaun's life story reads more like a page from the old days of knight errantry than like a record of this matter-of-fact century. The Countess is the daughter of one of the highest peers of Denmark and a granddaughter of a Prime Minister. When she was eighteen, she made her debut at the German court. The Empress Augusta chose her as lady of honor and for eighteen years she was the confidential friend of the Empress. During this time she met the leading statesmen, rulers and soldiers of the day and had the highest social honors of the court of Berlin. All the glitter and show failed to satisfy her soul. She says she longed for something higher and better. She studied her Bible and came to believe that Christianity from the Bible standpoint was a different thing from the generally accepted standards. Two events at this time made a powerful impression upon her mind. She visited the prisons of Berlin and spent a summer on one of the islands of the Baltic. Gradually the determination came to her to give her time and money to the relief of the needy and unfortunate, those whom the battle of life had gone against. She was especially interested in the poor sailors and fishermen of the Baltic. For ten years she carried on a work among them. The Emperor and Empress approved of her project and gave it substantial aid. She owns great estates in Denmark and all her income is given to the advancement of her philanthropic schemes. Her relatives have tried to prevent her from spending her money in this way and at one time confined her in an asylum. She was released through the efforts of powerful friends at court and pursued her labor of love and devotion to humanity with greater zeal than before. She purchased the royal pleasure yacht of Prince Waldemar of Denmark in order to reach her people more easily. She named the yacht Duen, or Dove. Since then the Duen has become known almost around the world. The work begun among the fishermen and sailors of the Baltic has extended, until the Countess has temporarily exhausted her fortune. Last summer she came to America. Her first stopping place was at Quebec, and since then she has made the tour of the lakes and the Duen is now in the harbor of New York. Last year the Countess visited over a hundred ships. She holds services on board her own ship and on those she visits. As long as her funds hold out she has a free coffee and tea kitchen on board the ship. In this way the Countess has fed thousands. She does not believe in the methods of organized charity with its inquisition of questions, but she literally obeys the command, "Feed the hungry, clothe the naked." The Countess is unmarried. She has adopted three sons whom she is educating. During her stay in New York she has spoken once or twice before large audiences. She tells the story of her life in good English. She says that she expects that money to carry on her work will come from some source as her own means are exhausted at present. For thirteen years her life has been one of great self denial and pure unselfishness. The Countess is now forty-five years of age. She is simple and direct in her manner and seems to have no other aim in life than to give herself, her time and her wealth to doing the service of Christ as He commanded in His word.

Gen. Redvers H. Buller, V. C., a famous officer in Her Majesty's army in South Africa, is a heavy, large-boned man with few society graces. He seems almost ungainly, with a severe face and a curt, incisive manner. He is straightforward in manner and determined in purpose. In many ways he resembles the Boers whom he hopes to overcome. He is tenacious of purpose, quiet and seemingly phlegmatic but with a masterful way that inspires confidence. He was but nineteen years of age when he procured his commission and entered the English army. Since then he has seen service in many lands. He was a member of the famous Red River expedition and won the favor and approval of his superior officer, Gen. Wolseley. He was made a chief officer in an expedition against the Ashantees and then was sent into South Africa. Here he won a reputation for cool daring and bravery and also as a thorough drill master. He won his V. C., or Victoria Cross, by his act when the British forces were retreating down a steep, rocky hill with the savages in close pursuit, when he took a wounded officer behind him on his horse. He carried him to a place of safety and then twice again performed the same act of valor. In 1882 he had become "Sir" Redvers and he then entered upon the famous Egyptian campaign. Again in 1885 he saw service on the Nile in one of England's most disastrous campaigns. Instances might be multiplied of the great executive ability and calm courage that distinguish the British commander. He has known rebuff, retreat and defeat but he has shown an ability to bring order out of chaos and to snatch victory when defeat seemed inevitable. He has not seen active service since the Nile campaign until the day he landed in South Africa. He had a brief service in Ireland and temporarily filled the position of under secretary for Ireland. He has had plenty of experience in detail and bureau work and is the author of the Infantry Drill Book, which is said to be the best book of its kind ever written. Gen. Buller is sixty years of age but it is safe to say, in spite of reverses, that the South African command could not have fallen into abler hands.

Ruth McEnery Stuart is one of a group of Southern women who have won distinction with the pen. Her stories of Southern life are marked by a rare sense of humor. She writes both prose and poetry and has been a constant contributor to all the leading magazines. Mrs. Stuart has a quiet, strong face, with calm, dark eyes and mobile features. There is a repose about her that is very restful. She sometimes reads from her published books and although she disclaims any gift as an elocutionist still those who hear her receive a never forgotten impression. The soft, slow voice and the Southern accent are peculiarly fitted to the dialect stories of the negro as he seemed "befo de wah". Mrs. Stuart is of Scotch descent. Her son is called Sterling Stuart and is a popular member of the Boys' High School of New York, where he has won no small fame as an all round athlete. Mrs. Stuart has a charming apartment in New York during the winter and in summer she has a home on Onteora mountain. Here she finds time for her favorite diversion—the study of mycology. She collects all the varieties of edible mushrooms and then proves that she can cook the tidbits as well as distinguish them from the common toad stools. Mrs. Stuart has won the greatest fame as a short story writer. There is a strong personal element in her work that seems to bring her own personality close to the reader. There is an undercurrent of the pathos that always goes with humor. This is very noticeable in her poems. She has won both financial and literary success and is generally acknowledged as one of the leading literary workers of the day.

Progress of the South African War.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

A PERSON reading the newspaper accounts of the Boer war will often feel confused as to the situation and the conduct of the war. The South African republic, which is commonly called the Transvaal, is in general appearance a square strip of territory bounded on the south by the Vaal River, which is the northern boundary of the Orange Free State, which is an ally of the Transvaal. Almost in the center and toward the south of the Transvaal is the capital, Pretoria, and a short distance to the southwest is Johannesburg. The objective point of the British campaign will necessarily be Pretoria, the capital. Neither of these states have any sea coast but are surrounded by British territory. The great problem which the British have to overcome is the keeping open of lines of communication, which are something like eight hundred miles in length, and which by a flank movement on the part of the alert Boers could be easily cut.

The principal fighting at the present time is not in the Transvaal itself, but in the British territory near the Orange Free State to the south of it. On the extreme west is the city of Kimberley, with its valuable diamond mines, which is now being besieged. On the extreme right, and within the British territory of Cape Colony, is the city of Ladysmith, which is on the line of railroad from the coast to Pretoria. This is also being besieged and bombarded by the Boers. South of this and nearer the coast is Pietermaritzburg, within the province of the same name. This is but a short distance from the Indian Ocean coast and is a city of considerable size. It is from here that a great many of the telegrams are sent giving accounts of the siege of Ladysmith. Many of these are brought in by native runners who are clad only in a breech clout and are painted to the color of the desert sands, and manage to work their way from the besieged city through the Boer lines into English territory. The city of Mafeking is also being besieged. This city is on the extreme west of the Transvaal republic, just inside English territory and far to the north of Kimberley. It is about these three points, or on the roads leading to them, that the different fights have occurred. The country, especially on the east side, is very mountainous, and the Boers are fighting on strategic points heavily intrenched and on the defensive.

THE BATTLEFIELD AT COLENSO.

Readers will remember that a man intrenched is considered to be equal to three men in the open. Calculations of military men at the present time make this number even greater, giving one intrenched man with modern equipment an equality with five men fighting in the open. By this it will be seen the great difficulty that the English have in driving these Boers from their line of defense.

The average reader pays little attention to the events which bring about a war; and although much was printed previous to the actual fighting, very few of the more intelligent readers really understand what the war is about. There is a great deal of sentiment about it being a sister republic and many other things raised pro and con which really have little bearing on the case. This war, like many others, is really brought about by commercial spirit, and throwing all sentiment aside is the old question of the survival of the fittest. The Boers represent a civilization of two centuries ago, and with all their good qualities are unprogressive and are standing in the way of the future development of Africa. The British represent commercial supremacy and advanced civilization and modern progress, and their way is blocked by the Transvaal republic. No matter what the excuse is, or what the reasons for actual warfare may be, there is undoubtedly the desire on the part of the great owners and tax payers of the Transvaal, who are not Dutch, to have the republic itself under English law and English dominion, and this is the real reason of the present fight.

To the impartial observer, as we have said, it would seem to be a case of the survival of the fittest. The sentiment that the Dutch are being driven out of their own country by English conquest would be just as applicable to the natives whom the Dutch drove out of the same territory. When they crossed the Vaal river and took possession of this country they were for years fighting the determined warriors of the African tribes who were in full possession of the country and had been peaceable and never gave up their possession until the Dutch Boers conquered them; and this is within the memory of a large proportion of the readers of this paper. This is merely written to show that there are all sides to all questions. A paper published in this country recently a translation of the demands which were made by the foreign residents before the declaration of war during the crisis. What the Uitlander demands as formulated in the official papers was as follows:

GEN. KITCHENER OF KHARTOUM.

1. The right to vote for the real legislative authority—the First Chamber of the Volksraad, not the impotent Second Chamber.
2. Such a redistribution of seats for the goldfields in the Volksraad as will give to them a proper representation. At present there is none at all. The Transvaal now offers one-fifth, but the Uitlanders represent three-fifths of the people. They pay nine-tenths of the taxation, yet they have nothing to say about the expenditure of a penny. Americans justly went to war with us on account of taxation without representation, and Uitlanders parallel their case with that of our forefathers.
3. A Constitution safeguarded from sudden changes. At present an ordinary resolution of the Volksraad may change the existing Constitution.
4. The heads of the Government responsible to the Volksraad.
5. Independence of the courts. At present, if a judge does not respect any chance vote of the Volksraad, he is dismissed from office. Chief Justice Kotze was so dismissed. This, in the opinion of many, is the great demand; the trouble is not so much a matter of the franchise. The most necessary reform is to free the judges from all interference by the Executive and the Volksraad. In all rightly governed countries the judges on the bench should be, like Cæsar's wife, above suspicion.

GENERAL P. A. CRONJE.

6. Cancellation of monopolies. This, of course, is far less important than the foregoing; it can more easily be adjusted.
7. Equality in recognition by the courts of the English and Dutch languages, just as we have it in Cape Colony.
8. Removal of religious disabilities. Neither Roman Catholics nor Jews may hold office.
9. Reorganization of the civil service.
10. A free press.
11. Proper schools.
12. Freer trade.

Americans are intelligent and there are very few that would not be with the Uitlanders in the present struggle if they were in South Africa. The fact that the Transvaal government denies all political, municipal and civil rights to the majority of the population, while the majority contribute nine-tenths of the money for the support of the same government, is a fact which will show any American how he naturally would feel. English papers claim that nine out of every ten Americans in the Transvaal support the Uitlander demands; and what is true of them is also true of German and French who are there, although their governments at home are bitterly hostile to the British policy.

All these points are contended by the Dutch republic, which claims entire rights over the country and that they wish to be let alone. They are an upright, God-fearing race of men, stubborn in their convictions and rather slow of comprehension, but undoubtedly having full faith in the righteousness of their present conflict.

The foregoing is not written with any intention to take sides in the contest; but to give COMFORT'S readers a clearer idea of the causes which led to the present unhappy struggle. In the same manner without attempting a historical story of the progress of the war we shall endeavor to give a concise statement of the military movement to show our readers the present situation. And it must be remembered that when this reaches the readers' eyes nearly a month will have elapsed since it was written and great changes may have taken place. At the time of writing (New Year's) both sides are quiet. The Boers are preparing for further resistance on the defensive, while the British are anxiously awaiting reinforcements to make another attempt to advance to the relief of the besieged cities. And near these armies are the points at which decisive battles may be fought any day.

As was above pointed out, there are three points now invested by the Boers and to the relief of which separate columns have been despatched. It must be remembered at the beginning that the Boers on declaring war rushed over the border and at once commenced investing three cities situated in three points; and all of great value and difficult to relieve.

To the westward is Kimberley. This is the city where the diamond mines are situated and where Cecil Rhodes, the African Magnate, has his headquarters. Although surrounded by the Boers, the garrison and inhabitants have successfully held out against them for several weeks and successfully repelled every assault. To the relief of this point Gen. Methuen's army is advancing from the south from Cape Colony along the line of railroad. His march has been checked all the way from De Aar by the Boers destroying the bridges and roadbed. Several battles were fought on the line; at Orange river, with heavy loss on both sides; at Belmont, Graspan and Modder river, only 25 miles from Kimberley. It was a terrible slaughter at the last place and a practical defeat for Methuen although the British still hold their ground unable to advance further.

The second, or Central army under Gen. Gatacre is moving upon the Orange Free State with the intention of reaching its objective point of Bloemfontein, the capital. This column met with an overwhelming reverse at Stormberg, on December 10th, where it unexpectedly met a strong Boer army, which ambushed the advancing force. So severe was this defeat that further advance was impossible and may lead to the abandonment of this line of action.

The third column is led by Sir Redvers Buller, of whom much was expected as he was the commander-in-chief of all the British forces in South Africa. This army landed at Durban on the East coast and hastened forward to the relief of Gen. White besieged at Ladysmith, the point to which the English at Glencoe fell back at the beginning of the conflict. On the 14th of December, Buller attempted to cross the Tugela river at Colenso and met with a crushing repulse in which he lost 1097 men, sixty-five being officers. He also lost 11 cannon, which was three times as many as Wellington lost to Napoleon in the whole Peninsular campaign. At this writing the success is entirely with the Boers; but the concensus of public opinion shows general belief in Boer defeat in time.

The Boer generals who have so distinguished themselves are Gen. P. A. Cronje, who defeated Lord Methuen at Modder river, and his superior General Piet Joubert, who defeated Buller himself and whose strategical ability so far has proven more than a match for the whole English Military Council. In England there has been a great outcry against the War Office, much as existed in this country during the Spanish War. Gen. Roberts, the Afghan hero, has been sent to Africa in supreme command. Gen. Lord Kitchener of Khartoum, the conqueror of the Mahdi, goes as his Chief of staff.

Among the devices made use of in this war are searchlights. Our initial cut shows how one from the ship Powerful was mounted on an armored car. It is said by employing a screen, signals from this light at Ladysmith have been flashed thirty miles. The other picture represents the exact scene of the terrible battle at Colenso. The level ground near the bridge is where the guns were captured. The banks of the stream are very steep with the edges partially covered by low brush, but on the south side of the river from where the picture is taken, there is absolutely no shelter, not even a tree.

LORD ROBERTS OF KANDAHAR.

The Boers were sheltered by the south bank of the river and firmly entrenched on the north bank and are said to have had a superior army to Buller's. Without proper reconnoisance he advanced and when attacked in his attempt to cross the river was at the mercy of the alert and mobile foe. At any time we may look for news of startling character as men and supplies are being rushed forward in desperate haste to succor the English.

TWO FINE SPECIMENS

Of Physical Manhood.

No form of athletic exercise demands such perfect physical condition as prize fighting. Every muscle in the body must be fully developed and supple, and the heart, lungs and stomach must act to perfection.

Whether we endorse prize-fighting or not, it is nevertheless interesting to know the manner by which men arrive at such physical perfection.

James Jefferies, the present champion heavy weight of the world, and his gallant opponent, Tom Sharkey, in the greatest pugilistic encounter that has ever taken place, both pursued much the same course of training and the first and most important part of this training was to get the stomach in condition, and keep the digestion absolutely perfect, so that every muscle and nerve would be at its highest capabilities.

This was not done by a secret patent medicine, but both of these great pugilists used a well known natural digestive tablet sold by druggists under name of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets and composed of the digestive ferments which every stomach requires for healthy digestion.

Champion Jefferies says: "Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets prevent acidity, strengthen the stomach and insure perfect digestion. They keep a man in fine physical condition." Signed James J. Jefferies, champion of the world.

The gallant fighter, Sharkey, says: "Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets remove all discomfort after eating. They rest the stomach and restore it to a healthful condition. I heartily recommend them." Signed, Thos. J. Sharkey.

The advantage of the daily use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets is that they keep the people well and ward off sickness and are equally valuable to well persons as to the dyspeptics. Another advantage is that these tablets contain no cathartics, or poisons of any character, but simply digestive ferments which are found in every healthy stomach, and when digestion is imperfect it is because the stomach lacks some of these elements and Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets supply it.

They are no cheap cathartic, but a perfectly safe and efficient digestive and the demand for them is greater than the sale of all other so-called dyspepsia cures combined. No remedy could possibly reach such a place in public esteem except as the result of positive merit.

Full sized packages are sold by all druggists at 50 cents and the best habit you can possibly form is to take a Stuart's Tablet after each meal. They make weak stomachs strong and keep strong stomachs vigorous.

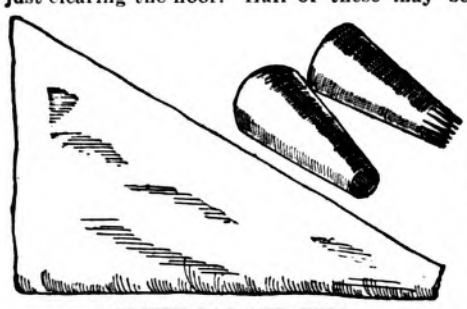
MAKERS OF HIGH GRADE AMERICAN PIANOS AND ORGANS

ORGANS FROM $25.00

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.



THERE is nothing more fascinating to the housewife than the decoration of the table for dinner parties, Christmas and Thanksgiving feasts, and all of the other extra times when we may indulge in something that is not strictly to be eaten.

At all times one may have a silver or china jardiniere filled with ferns and a cocoa palm, for the center of the table, and this gives the eye something restful to look at and at the same time makes the meal seem more cosey and cheerful,—setting off the cloth and silver and glass by way of contrast.

In addition to this regular decoration, vines may be used to run out to the ends and sides of the table from the centerpiece—or, if there are to be a number of covers and the room for this cannot be spared, use silver candelabra on either end of the table, and decorate the chandelier, over the center of the table, with as much green as can be obtained.

At a recent lunch for ladies, a novel idea was the formation, from the green centerpiece, of rays of narrow red ribbon, one end of each piece ending at each cover, and the other end being tucked carefully into the green at the center. After the lunch had been served, each guest was told to pull on the end of the ribbon, and at the other end was found a card, which was hidden in the greenery, and which had upon it a question to be answered and a line of poetry. Simply an idea for keeping people busy either in answering the question or in wondering from what poem the verse was chosen.

An idea for a doorway is suggested, which is particularly appropriate for the door leading into the dining room. A pole should be fastened across the top of the door, inside the frame, and from this hang ropes of evergreen, just clearing the floor. Half of these may be tied back with a ribbon, or all may be left to hang, as they are easily pushed aside on passing through the door.

Next to the table decoration comes the decoration of the dainties which milady serves to her guests.

It often happens that for a luncheon or tea, there is little that can be served which looks really attractive, except the salad, or a dessert that can be served with a quantity of whipped cream. Then the dish is made specially pretty by the use of the pastry bag, for putting on the dressing, or the cream.

A pastry bag is made of a square of rubber cloth, usually about ten inches square. Fold over the two opposite corners toward the center, and seam up on the machine the two edges coming together, leaving at the point an inch that has not been sewed. Cut off the little point of cloth that sticks out at this corner, and a small opening will remain, just large enough for the insertion, from the inside, of tubes, or tin ends. We give an illustration of a bag and two of the ends most common, one of which is plain, and the other cut in points—called the rose tube. The tube is pushed into the bag, and then the bag is filled with the dressing or whipped cream or beaten egg—whatever is to be used, and forced through the tube. When all is used, the bag is simply washed and hung up to dry, and is then ready for the next time. The bags cost from 35 cents up to 75, according to size, but can be made for considerably less by buying the rubber cloth. The tubes cost ten cents each. Confectioners who are experts often use simply a cornucopia of stiff paper, for the frosting of cake etc., and arrive at the very best results—but for the beginner it is easier to have the stiff point from which to squeeze the dressing, and then the roses or vines are more likely to be uniform in size. A salad thus decorated is much more attractive than when the dressing is simply stirred in—and a shortcake, or uncovered pie, such as lemon, looks quite festive when decorated with these vines and roses of frosting.

APRICOT FOAM.

Many people do not know what delicious pies may be made from stewed apricot. The dried apricots may be bought at all times of the year, and when stewed with sugar and strained they make a very good pie for a change. This sort of a pie should have strips of the crust across the top, instead of a top crust, to make it more attractive.

Apricot is also delicious when stewed, strained and beaten up with the whites of eggs. For this, half a pound of apricots should be soaked in lukewarm water over night; in the morning add a cup of sugar and stew until soft; rub through a strainer and set away to cool. Just before time to serve, beat the whites of two eggs to a stiff froth and then beat in the apricot and pile onto a glass dish. Serve very cold.

How many of you have ever thought of baking your squash, instead of steaming? Of course small squash should be used, as they are served whole. For this, cut out a small circle around the stem and remove the seeds; brush the inside with butter, shake in a little salt and pepper and bake. Serve the squash whole, on a napkin, and in serving each person, cut a piece from the squash following the lines of indentation on the rind.

WHY WOMEN ARE NERVOUS.

[British Medical News.]

The frequent cases of nervous prostration or utter collapse of the nervous system under which women "go all to pieces," as the saying is, have caused much thought and investigation on the part of physicians.

Certain inorganic substances are well known to cause various forms of nervous diseases which are readily traced to the poisons producing them. Further research leads to the belief that alum is a prevailing cause of so-called nervous prostration, for the symptoms it produces on the nervous system after its absorption into the blood are very remarkable indeed. Experiments physiologically made upon animals by Orfila, Professors Hans Mayer, Paul Seim and others, show that alum frequently produces no visible symptoms for many days after its introduction into the body. Then follow loss of appetite and other alimentary disturbances, and finally a serious prostration of the whole nervous system. The most prominent physicians now believe that "nervous prostration" and many affections of the nerves from which both men and women suffer are caused by the continued absorption of alum into the system.

It is probable that many medical men are unaware of the extent to which salts of alumina may be introduced into the body, being under the impression that the use of alum in bread is prohibited. Alum, however, is still used surreptitiously to some extent to whiten bread, and very largely in making cheap kinds of baking powder. In families where baking powder is generally used great care should be exercised to procure only those brands made from cream of tartar. The alum powders may generally be distinguished by the lower price at which they are sold.

ONE of the most remarkable rings in the world is "The Ring of the Fisherman", worn by the Pope and handed down by each one to his successor. In this ring St. Peter is seen sitting in a boat and holding in each hand a net. This ring is kept in charge by the grand chamberlain of his Holiness, and, in the event of his death the name of the Pope is at once erased from its surface and the name of his successor is engraved upon it immediately upon his election to the office.

FERROL, the principal naval arsenal of Spain, lies on the north arm of the Bay of Betanzas. Its harbor is one of the best in Europe, and is entered by a narrow strait, still guarded by the canties of San Felipe and Palma, mounting several guns. The town is strongly fortified on the land side. Its vast arsenal and dock yard cover twenty-four acres, and comprise many magnificent storehouses and docks. There are two dry docks, the larger being four hundred and seventy-four feet long.

FREDERIC Macmonnies, the sculptor, has his studio and grounds fitted up with models which are a terror to human visitors. A raging panther occupies a cage in one corner, while various other wild beasts are quartered here both in house and grounds. Four beautiful, high-spirited horses have the freedom of the place and are sometimes driven at full speed across and across the sunny garden-court for hours at a time in order that the artist may study their anatomy and action, and imitate them in clay.

THE first pension ever granted to a Chinaman was issued July 20 to Ah Yu, of Shanghi, China. Ah Yu has faithfully served Uncle Sam since July, 1884, as landsman, mess assistant and cabin steward. His last service was when attached to Admiral Dewey's flagship, the Olympia, in 1897. Since then he has been in a hospital at Yokohama, suffering from a disease of the lungs, and has at last, becoming no better and there being no hopes of his ever becoming so, been discharged from the service and pensioned for the remainder of his days. His pension calls for $30 per month, with back pay amounting to $510.

The Origin of Playing Cards.

THE costumes of the pictured playing cards of the ordinary pack are very quaint, and one would hardly suppose them to have been copied originally from real people. It is a fact, however, that the king is Henry VIII., though on the present cards only a few suggestions remain of the peculiarities of his costume, which at one time was covered with correct heraldic devices. The king of hearts is the most warlike in appearance, bearing as he does an uplifted sword, as if in the act of striking. The king of spades is armed with a battle axe; the king of clubs and also of diamonds bears a doubled-edged sword.

At one time cards were influenced by the Italian fashions imported into France by Catherine de Medici, and after the French revolution the kings of the pack were changed to represent sages and philosophers; but the kings and queens returned to the pack when the monarchy was restored.

The queen of the cards is said to be Elizabeth of York, mother of Henry VIII., and the rose of York in her hand has been preserved up to date.

The grotesque dress of the knaves of the pack has remained practically unchanged during centuries. It was taken from the ordinary costume of the lower classes. The knave of hearts has a battle axe in one hand and a laurel leaf in the other. The queer looking emblem in the hand of the knave of clubs is supposed to be an arrow. The knave of diamonds holds a pike with a hook. The twist ribbon on the knave of spades is supposed to have been intended to represent the fool's staff, with the gay ribbons twined around it. The knave is called Jack from his fool's dress, the slang name for a jester being Jack.

It is said that the gypsies brought the first cards into Europe about the time of the Crusades; they used them then as they do now, for fortune-telling. Packs originally contained seventy-two cards. Several kinds of cards are used in China, one pack having thirty-two covered with small circular dots in red and black, the court cards being of one man and one woman. Chinese cards are usually printed in black on thin cardboard, one inch wide by three and a half inches long.

Whist is of Chinese origin.

THE elephants of the Indian army are fed in a peculiar way. The ten pounds of rice which make a breakfast for one of them is done up in leaves and tied with grass. The animals are drawn up in line before a row of piles of this food. At the word of command each elephant raises his trunk and one of these bundles is thrown into his capacious mouth. This is continued until every elephant has received his allotment of food.

"THE LIGHT THAT WON'T GO OUT."

Every family in America is ready to buy "The light that sells on sight"—the wonderful new invention called ARC-LIGHT WICK.

It burns a whole year without trimming. It kills a candle, discounts kerosene, beats gas, and almost equals electricity or sunlight.

It saves 20 per cent. of oil. It's clear, white and brilliant. It's the light that won't go out. It's the light in the window for thee.

The Light That Sells On Sight.

The ARC-LIGHT is something new. All need it, all buy it, all bless it. To show it means to sell it, and it yields from 100 per cent. to 300 per cent. profit to agents.

The same kind of carbon that gives the electric light its brilliancy is woven into the Arc-Light by a patent process. We hold affidavit showing that an Arc-Light burned 1040 hours, giving the last hour the same perfect, brilliant, light it gave the first.

A single lamp manufacturer in New England, who bought over 35,000 writes: "The Arc-Light beats all others. It sells our lamps, and turns night into day." Every home, store, hotel, saloon, hall, church, or car company will buy the Arc-Light Wick on sight. We have made arrangements with the manufacturers to introduce this wonderful discovery, and we offer for 60 days the following wholesale terms to agents:

Medium or A wick, 5-8 inch wide—the size for house lamps—by mail, sample 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $2.50. Small or E wicks, for hand lamps, lanterns, etc., 3-8 inch wide, sample, 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $2.50 Large or B wicks, for table, hall, store, or bracket lamps, 1 inch wide, sample, 5 cents per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $3.50. D wick, 1 1-2 inches wide, for incubators, hall, bracket, or store lamps, sample, 8 cents; 33 cents dozen; $3.50 gross. A rgand wicks for parlor lamps, sample, 33 cents; per gross, $3.50. On all orders for $10.00 accompanied by cor sample dozen, giving width desired, and see how they go. We can supply you with any style ARC-LIGHT WICK in any quantities, from a single wick to a thousand dozen.

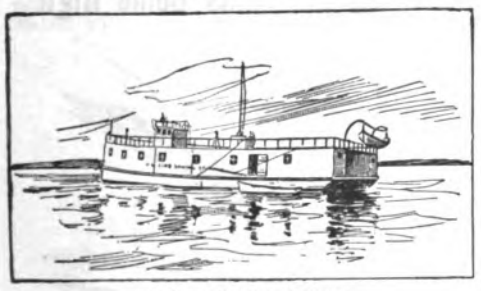
DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS:

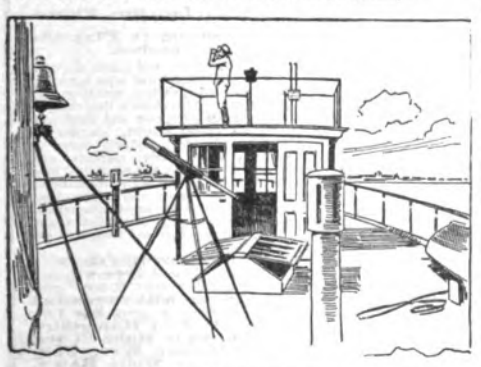


Again we have rounded out the year that dates back in its beginning to this, the shortest of all the months, but which, short as it is, holds in its embrace so many events of historic interest. Like all her brothers and sisters, February is a many sided month, and her smiles or frowns depend entirely upon the spot from which we view her. To our cousin of the first letter, who writes from the bleak shores of Massachusetts, she shows a frozen face; while to the soldier in the Philippines who sends us the second she smiles with warm and sunny grace.

And so it ever is. In our mental as well as in our physical lives we cannot all see the golden side of the shield, but we can all do our best in the spot where we are placed and remember how true it is that—

"Life, my dear, is what you make it,
And the world is as you take it."

But now let us attend to our mail. Here is a letter on the life saving station near Boston, Massachusetts.



"In Dorchester Bay, near Boston, the United States Government has been trying an experiment in the shape of a floating life-saving station which has worked very successfully. This is the only station of the kind in the country, if not in the world, except one much smaller at the falls in the Kentucky River, at Louisville.

"Dorchester Bay is the place where nearly all the yacht clubs of Boston rendezvous. Sometimes two hundred boats can be counted under sail there at one time, and there are also many rowboats and many bathers. On account of the numerous accidents there, and too often deaths by drowning, the Government established this station. It is a big, flat boat, shaped like a huge flatiron, and is anchored in the bay from the first of May until the middle of November. Ten men, including Captain E. C. Glawson, live on board all of the time. A lookout is built on the top of the upper deck and in this, day and night, a man is all the time on watch for accidents. Two gasoline launches are ready to start at a moment's notice to carry out the captain and men to the rescue. Since the station has been there it has saved many lives and thousands of dollars worth of property.

LOOKOUT TOWER ON LIFE-SAVING STATION.

"I was spending a day on the station not long ago. It was hot, or would have been except for a strong wind which had tempted a number of sail boats out. I had been sitting on deck, talking with the captain, when all at once he shouted, 'Ring the alarm!' and disappeared down through a scuttle before I knew anything was the matter. A bell began to clang and the men, who all wear white duck suits, began to tumble into the boats. It took just forty-five seconds for the launch to get under way, towing a tender behind. The captain had seen a cat-boat, about a quarter of a mile away, capsize. There were two boys in her. They clung to the keel until the launch reached them and then were brought to the station and given dry clothes while their clothes were hung out on a line on deck to dry. The boat was towed ashore and beached. The day before the launch rescued a party of six who had been capsized in a sloop and who must almost certainly have drowned if it had not been for this timely aid." MAX BENNETT THRASHER.

Next comes a description, sent us by an old friend, of a curiosity in the way of a potter.

"Among the curious places of interest in Biloxi, Mississippi, none more deserve mention than the art pottery owned by Mr. George Ohr of that place. This curious shop is the greatest show place in town and its owner has become famous at home and abroad by the quaint and almost indescribable shapes he has fashioned out of clay.

"The building is about half a dozen stories high, each one smaller than the one just below, and the inside is most oddly constructed, while on the shelves and ranged around the walls are countless designs from which one may select some unique specimen of pottery. Mr. Ohr is a genial, pleasant faced man, and is most courteous to all his visitors, but as he fashions the clay in whatever design happens to impress itself on his mind at the time, it is a peculiarity that but one thing of a kind is ever found on his shelves.

"One of the greatest curiosities of this odd shop is the puzzle drinking cup from which, if one knows the secret, he may drink without spilling, but not a drop will come to the mouth of those not in the secret. Visitors always buy some specimen and often get a souvenir gift from the owner. Among the quaint compositions are the queerest sort of pipes, quaintly shaped inkstands and flower vases, and almost anything one may wish for. If the article desired is not in stock Mr. Ohr will make it while you wait for it. So satisfied is he of his skill in this line of work that he challenges the potters of the world to compete with him in producing unique and original designs."

LOUELLA SPENCE, Pass Christian, Miss.

About two or three months ago we had a letter written by a soldier in the Philippines, and now here is one from another soldier there; but as this one takes us into a comparatively unknown part of the islands I think you will find it interesting. The first letter was from Manila, I believe. Our correspondent says:

"Much has been said and written of our new possessions in the Philippines and their sullen inhabitants which have given our Government so much trouble; but the subject is still new, so a few words from the island of Jalo may be of interest to the readers of COMFORT.

"We took possession of this island on the tenth day of June, the Spaniards having already surrendered. The natives offered no resistance and are very friendly. The twenty-third infantry was sent here from Manila to relieve the Spanish garrison. Jalo is one of the most southerly of the Philippines and is only about six degrees north of the equator. The island of Borneo is our immediate neighbor, lying only twenty miles to the south-east, and may be seen on any clear day. The natives of Jalo are the same as those of Borneo. We have all heard of 'the wild man of Borneo', but none of us ever expected to own him, as we certainly now do. Most of the extreme southerly islands of the Philippines are inhabited by this race; though fierce and war-like in appearance we have had no trouble with them yet, and very possibly may never have. At first we momentarily expected an outbreak, but none came, and now things are relaxing a little as we get better acquainted. The natives all carry spears about eight feet in length and knives three feet long, which they wield with great dexterity. With the spear they have been seen to kill birds on the wing.

"They are a very strange class of people, wearing little or no clothing, and many of them so closely resemble the ape that they are never seen to speak. Those who do talk chatter precisely like apes and monkeys. They have no religion whatever, and do not even worship idols. They are repulsive and degraded, and the words used by Stanley in describing the natives of equatorial Africa will apply equally well to these people—'Ugly, uglier, ugliest'. They differ very much from the Filipinos of Luzon Island, the Filipino being vastly the more intelligent. These people call themselves Moros, never having heard of Aguinaldo, or the island of Luzon. They think the island of Borneo is the largest country in the world, and cannot be made to understand the magnitude of the United States.

"Jalo is healthfully situated and the climate is delightful; the heat is not unbearable, and the nights are remarkably cool for a tropical country. The soil is very productive, almost any tropical product thriving in it. The water is good and very plentiful, and there has been little or no sickness among the soldiers since our arrival here.

"Many more interesting things might be said of our new possessions here, and if our kind Aunt will permit I may write again."

J. A. WOODS, Jalo Island, Philippines.

Now comes a visitor from a Kentucky tobacco field.

"I wonder how many of our cousins ever saw a field of growing tobacco. A brief description of the cultivation of a crop which forms one of the largest articles of commerce, and one which has made Kentucky famous, may interest Aunt Minerva's readers.

"In January or February a seed bed is prepared, generally upon a hillside with a southern slope, by piling a large amount of rubbish together and burning it. This is done to destroy any foreign seed that might be in the soil. After this the bed is dug up and the soil made very fine, then the seed is sown and a thin cloth placed over the bed to protect the small plants from insects.

"When the plants get about three inches high they are transplanted to the field which has been prepared for them by plowing up the field two or three times and harrowing it until the soil is in good condition; rows are then checked off about three and one-half feet apart each way and at each check a hill is made by a 'man with a hoe'. And then, when it rains, if the plants are large enough they are transplanted to the hills. After this the plants are cultivated until they get so large that a plow or cultivator cannot be run between the plants without damage to them. When the cultivator is stopped, sometimes before, the top is broken out of each plant, leaving from eight to twenty leaves on each one, according to the strength of the soil. Once a week after the top is broken out each plant has to be 'suckered', as it is called, which is nothing more than breaking out a small shoot that grows out where each leaf joins the main stalk of the plant.

"When the plants are ripe they are cut by splitting the stalk down the center to about three inches from the bottom and cutting off at the ground. The plants are then hung on a stick about four feet long, eight or ten plants to the stick, and hauled to a barn where these sticks are hung up. When a barn is filled, which is usually done in two days' time, a fire is started underneath the hanging plants which soon 'cures' them. Soon afterwards they are ready for 'stripping', which is done in damp weather, by pulling the leaves from the stalk and tying them up in small bundles or 'hands' of five to ten leaves in a 'hand.' When this work is completed the tobacco is packed into hogsheads and by using great pressure with a screw made for the purpose, two and three thousand pounds are pressed into a very small bulk. It is then ready for the manufacturers of plug tobacco, cigars, smoking tobacco, snuff, etc. Much tobacco of the inferior grades is used in great dying establishments and in many other ways."

J. W. COLE, Benton, Kentucky.

Our next letter is also from Kentucky, but is upon a very different subject from the last.

"On April 30, 1789, George Washington was inaugurated the first President of our nation. And as that day is now historic we celebrated its return in 1898 by visiting the old homestead of a man whom the people of the United States honored by conferring upon him in 1837 the office of Vice President of the country,—Colonel Richard M. Johnson.

"We started about eleven in the morning for the old plantation, which lies about five miles from Georgetown, Scott Co., Ky., and were soon at the village of Great Crossings, situated on both banks of the deep blue Elkhorn river, which winds its course through the 'Garden Spot of the World,' the blue-grass region of Kentucky. Passing through the village and over the fine pike with many beautiful residences on either side, we finally arrived at the end of our journey.

"Some large stone houses which had been used as schoolhouses for the Indians first attracted our attention. Colonel Johnson's old home is of brick, and has the ante-bellum appearance so noticeable all through the South. It is pillared up over a precipice on the north side with limestone rocks. Down in the back yard, a most beautiful lawn of blue grass dotted with violets, were many tall green trees, and a large, bottomless spring of pure water. Opposite this spring, on a little mound, was an old locust stump which is famous as being the rostrum from which Lafayette addressed the people of Kentucky on his celebrated visit to America in 1824.

"On the east side of the house white ducks were dabbling in a little brooklet that wends its way through the green meadows until it meets the Elkhorn, while on the south the cattle and horses were grazing.

"Col. Johnson, who was distinguished in his military career as well as in his office as Vice-President, is reputed to have been the slayer of the famous Indian Chief, Tecumseh, but as this latter is a much-disputed point, we do not vouch for its truth. Colonel Johnson died at Richmond, Va., and his body now rests under a stately monument at Louisville, Kentucky."

W. B. ELDER, Albany, Ky.

Still another letter on Washington and his times, but this one takes us to the historic old city of Boston.

"On this spot stood Washington, who looking down upon the floor below, said 'One would have thought they might at least have spared the temples of the conntry.'

"A sign with this inscription on it hangs on the balcony of the famous Old South Church on Washington street, Boston. When the British soldiers occupied Boston, during the Revolutionary War they wantonly tore out the pews from this, then the leading church in this city, and used the floor for a riding school. Of course the damage done was great, and when the British were driven out of the city and Washington, just having entered, stood on the spot marked by the sign it was like looking down into a stable.

"Interest in the quaint old church is increased just now from the fact that the roof has become so decayed by age that it is no longer safe, and is to be replaced at once. The old roof is of wood, with massive wooden timbers mortised together into a frame. One queer thing about the roof is that it is double, one roof beneath another, with a space of a foot in between. Oddly enough history has preserved no record of why this was built in this way, and architects guess for a reason. Some think one roof leaked and another was built over it. The new roof is to be of iron, but in shape it will be exactly like the old one, so that when done the appearance of the old church will not be changed. The Old South is not used as a place of worship now, but as a historical museum. On patriotic holidays the school children of Boston meet there to sing patriotic songs and hear addresses by famous men and women."

LAWRENCE HADLEY, Boston, Mass.

Here is a pleasant letter from a cousin in far-away Oregon. She or he says:

"As I sat to-day looking over the columns of COMFORT I could heartily endorse the opinion of a friend who remarked to me, 'COMFORT paper is indeed a comfort.' What a rest to look over the letters from various states; and seeing, as we read, those many pleasant places brings a change and rest into our hard-working lives.

"Now perhaps some of your readers would like to know something of this beautiful Rogue River valley. It is one of the most fertile valleys I have ever visited, about forty-five miles long by eighteen wide, and has a railroad running its entire length. There are many pretty towns in it, both on the railroad and throughout the valley. Of these Ashland lies at the southern end of the valley, near the foot of the Siskiyou mountains, and is a city of about four thousand inhabitants. The surrounding hills contain many rich mines, while in the valley all kinds of fruits and vegetables are grown. I am told that there were gathered fifteen hundred and ninety gallons of small fruits last season from the garden of one small rented farm of forty-five acres near here. If any of the eastern cousins are tired of the snow and ice of that bleak region, and would like a nice little home here where to-day, the fifteenth of November, the air is as pleasant as in August, I will be glad to assist them if they will write to me of their wish. I found a nice home in California through the columns of COMFORT, and I shall be glad to be of use to others in finding a home in a mild climate."

C. MARSHALL, Ashland, Jackson Co., Oregon.

Now we will visit Nevada a State which we have hitherto rather neglected in our travels.

"One of the most costly and substantial yet short-lived of bridges was the one built over twenty years ago across one end of the beautiful Washoe lake eight miles south of Virginia City, Nevada.

"When the celebrated Ophir mine was being worked and was at the height of its glory there was not sufficient water power in the immediate vicinity with which to run a mill to work the ore.

"However, some ten miles from the mine lay Washoe lake from whose abundance water could be pumped to carry on the great mining enterprise.

"It was a difficult matter however to obtain a site for a mill as the lake's shores were composed of undulating cliffs. So to erect the mill it was first necessary to build a bridge across one end of the lake to the one level building site on the opposite shore, and work was immediately begun. A large force of men with numerous teams were engaged and soon the driving of piles was going vigorously on. Pile after pile went down through the clear, blue water, planks were secured to them and after many months of ceaseless toil the great bridge spanning a mile of water was completed. The lumber for the mill was at once hauled and the huge building with its massive machinery was in a comparatively short time put in motion. Not only was the bridge used for the constant mill traffic, for it soon became a favorite route for travelers going to and from Virginia City, and it was for years one of the best paying toll bridges in that region where toll roads and bridges, owing to the enormous sums expended in their construction, were the rule instead of the exception. In time, however, with the going down of the Ophir mine the bridge was used less and less, and as all uncared for possessions do, lost its once prosperous appearance."

Many thanks to Robert Reynolds, of Asheville, N. C., for his pleasant letter. I am sorry not to be able to use the letter sent us by Frank Lyon Holden, but it is not just what we want on this page.

And now, although my lap is still full of letters from cousins in all parts of the country, my space is filled and I must reluctantly say good-by for another month. AUNT MINERVA.

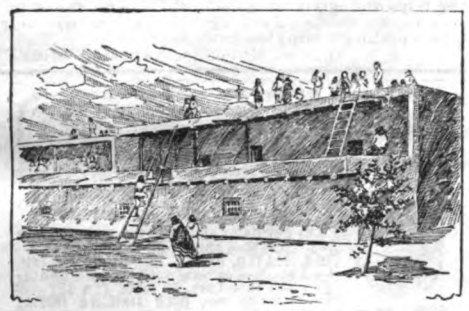
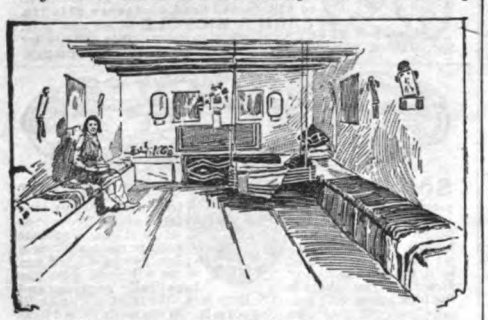
THE CHILDREN OF THE SUN.



WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

AND are they not well named, these people who dwell in the sky city of Acoma? In the far south-western part of our country are wonders and beauties little dreamed of by those who never leave the beaten tracks. In this category Acoma stands first. It is unique and one may travel the world around for more surpassing beauty. In a fertile valley, rich in crops and green with verdant grass, rises the steep and rugged table rock upon which the city of Acoma is built. The Pueblo Indians who inhabit it are the descendants of those ancient Queres, who built it more than five centuries ago. The mesa, or uneven plain with cliff sides, rises three hundred and fifty-seven feet above the plain, with such steep sides that in many places the higher masses overhang. On all sides the beauty of these cliffs is remarkable. Broken and weathered into strange shapes, sometimes like huge towers and again like bridges spanning mystic depths, these masses of rock loom up in the distance like mysterious beasts from another world. Upon a nearer approach one may see the winding trail leading from the plain to the mesa. In this ladder of rock the feet of generations have worn deep footprints and one thinks, not without admiration, of the thousands of feet which have toiled laboriously over these steps, carrying every particle of the stone, the adobe and the wood which has built the city.

The mesa covers about seventy acres and its top is about seven thousand feet above the sea. It is in two parts, connected by a narrow isthmus so that its shape is something like that of a pair of spectacles. On the southern end of this skyward island is a vast reservoir of cool water, from which the people obtain their drinking water, but there are no dwellings here and the water is carried in great jars on the heads of the women.



As one looks upon the terraced houses and the church, whose tower rises sixty feet above his head, his wonder at the patience of this people increases almost to incredulity. As he looks at the massive timbers of the church and hears that they were all brought from the mountains twenty miles away, he learns a lesson which years of civilization cannot teach him. The houses are built in long rows or in a rectangle. They are usually three stories high with a straight wall on the outside and terraces toward the yard in front. Usually there are no doors on the lower floor but, climbing a ladder, one may descend through a trap door from the roof. Then back a little on this same roof, are the openings to the second story homes and again ascending by quaint little stairs cut in the wall one comes to the third story. There are no interior connections between the houses and both doors and windows are very small. It is a most enticing occupation that of wandering about the housetops, descending the rude stairs and coming suddenly upon some one's front door just under your feet. The interiors are simple in the extreme. The walls are hung with blankets and trophies of the hunt, under which are long benches covered with the mattresses which are laid upon the floor at night for a bed. In one corner is a fireplace, above which are a row of jars containing fresh water from the reservoir.

The people of Acoma are good Catholics while they are in church but everywhere else they are pagans. Here and there one comes across the signs of paganism which these Indians have never pretended to abolish. There are the sacred rooms in which are performed rites and ceremonies which may be witnessed only by the great men of the nation. All about are mysterious symbols, sticks, bunches of sacred grass, or a figure, statuesque, standing upon the housetop as the sun sets. The stranger cares not to meddle with these things which belong not to him, and woe to him if his curiosity triumphs! After the body of a departed soul is laid at rest in the churchyard with all the pomp of the Catholic service, one may see the funeral procession pass again to the house of sorrow and carry forth all that was dear to the one who has gone, his blankets, his ornaments, his clothes, and these, broken and torn, are burned, that they may follow their owner to his new home. It is a strange mingling of religion.

The people of Acoma are shepherds and tillers of the soil. The fertile valley below them has been secured to them by a settlement from the United States government. It is some twelve miles long and five wide and contains excellent land for raising corn and vegetables, while the grassy patches are dotted with herds of horses and cattle and sheep. The Pueblo is a gentleman farmer, usually employing the Navajo Indian to do the menial part of his farming, while he employs his time in superintending his property or improving it. Irrigation is the great lesson which these Indians have taught to the white man and no lesson is of more importance in that arid region of deserts.

Physically the Pueblo is superior to most races of our day. He is tall, robust and well built, with a face which shows superiority of intellect. The women are often handsome with neck and shoulders which might make any woman envious. Their dress is a loose, hanging robe of cotton or wool and for festivals their ornaments of silver make a gorgeous setting to a fine figure. These people are extremely fond of fun and of stories. Many of their folk stories are full of pathos and beauty and their songs would rival many of our modern musical attempts.

The Pueblos are a peace-loving people, but it was not always so. Long ago, as their fort-like houses attest, a sentinel was needed on every housetop and the ladders of rock were often red with blood. Their worst enemies were of course the Spaniards but in the course of time they became their best friends and taught the Indians many lessons which have helped them to live more comfortably. Now for hundreds of years peace has reigned and it is likely to for hundreds of years to come. There, upon that wonderful island rising towards the sky, live these simple people, unknown almost, to most of the civilized world. There, amid that wonder of peaks and crags and balanced rocks, of undreamed-of caves and arches, live this race of nature lovers, high up in the blue, clear air of an almost tropic climate. The traveler who sees this people in their home witnesses a scene which rivals in beauty and in picturesqueness any scene of Egypt or the far East.

Cures Drunken Son

Remarkable Success of a Remedy Which a Woman Used Secretly and Saved Her Son From Destruction.

Is Given in Tea, Coffee or Food and Cures the Worst Drunkard Without His Knowing the Reason.

Every woman in this broad land is given an inspiration in the words of Mrs. Howard Tarleton, whose address is Box 646, Lebanon, Ohio, that must result in the greatest temperance crusade ever started. She cured her son of drunkenness after he had become a sot, a common loafer and now he is a reformed, upright citizen, rejoicing with his mother in the wonderful result and the marvelous remedy that brought about this grand change in his life.

"Yes, I cured my son of drunkenness," said Mrs. Tarleton, when interviewed about it, "with Golden Specific, the new discovery which can be given in tea, coffee or food. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or daughter looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed even against his will or without his knowledge or cooperation. I advise every woman to send her name and address to Dr. J. W. Haines, 1393 Glenn Bldg., Cincinnati, O., who will mail a trial package of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee or food and that it will cure the dreaded habit quietly and permanently, also full directions how to use it, books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to aid you in saving those near and dear to you from a life of degradation and ultimate poverty and disgrace."

STILL A MYSTERY.

Prof. S. A. Weltmer, Through the New Science, Weltmerism, Continues to Startle the World by His Astounding Cures.

LEARN A PROFESSION THAT BRINGS A GOLDEN HARVEST.

The miseries of disease have been transformed into the joys of health by a new science that is as mysterious as it is efficacious. This new science which is known as Weltmerism, as it takes its name from Prof. S. A. Weltmer, of Nevada, Mo., who originated it, is now endorsed by the press and pulpit. This universal endorsement came about from the fact that this wonderful curative power which cures diseases at a distance just as readily as it does those cases that are personally brought to Nevada for treatment has been tested in the past two years on more than 100,000 cases of every disease known to man or woman, some acute, others chronic; some were cases of women who suffered every agony from diseases common to their sex, and others from men who suffered debilitation from early indiscretions; in fact there is no affliction known that was not tested by this wonderful method of Magnetic Healing and it is recorded that in every instance relief was almost instantly brought on and in more than ninety per cent. a permanent cure was effected. So tremendously successful has been Weltmerism in the curing of diseases that all skepticism has been dispelled and scientists throughout the civilized world proclaim that on account of Weltmerism it can now be said for the first time in the history of the world that the curing of disease is brought into the domain of an exact science, and in all diseases no matter what their nature a cure can be effected. We have received from the hands of Prof. J. H. Kelly, the noted scientist, who is a co-laborer of Prof. Weltmer, a few of the many testimonials that are in his possession: T. T. Rodes, of Paris, Mo., the Prosecuting Attorney for Monroe County, suffered for years from Sciatic Rheumatism, tried everything without benefit; was instantly cured through Prof. Weltmer's Absent Treatment. Mr. Rodes has recently won fame as the attorney in the celebrated Jester case. Mrs. C. R. Graham of Boise City, Iowa, was afflicted for nine years with rheumatism; she could not walk without crutches or lift her hands to her head; she paid out $3,000 with doctors before coming to Nevada; she now proclaims herself cured and a happy woman, through Weltmerism. Mrs. D. H. Allen, of Aurora Springs, Mo., was in a hopeless condition, as she suffered from consumption in its worst form; she could not sleep without the aid of morphine; tried everything without relief; fully restored by Prof. Weltmer's Absent Treatment. D. E. Alford, of Rubens, Jewell Co., Kans., suffered for three years with Kidney and Stomach troubles; tried the best medical authorities, but was told that his case was hopeless; took Prof. Weltmer's Absent Treatment and in the three days was cured. Mrs. Jennie L. Lynch, Lakeview, Mo., was for two years afflicted with ulceration of the womb, heart and stomach troubles and general debility; was reduced to a mere skeleton; after taking gallons of obnoxious medicines, without relief, she tried the Weltmer Absent Treatment. In less than thirty days she was entirely relieved and gained fifteen pounds. Mr. G. W. Hightower, Tiff City, Mo., was a total wreck; suffered many years with stomach, liver and kindred troubles; tried everything without relief; fully restored by Prof. Weltmer's Absent Method. Mrs. M. M. Walker, Poca, W. Va., suffered with eczema, indigestion and other troubles; dozens of doctors failed to give any relief; she was permanently restored by Prof. Weltmer's Absent Method in two months. By writing Prof. S. A. Weltmer, Nevada, Mo., you will receive free of charge, The Magnetic Journal, a 40-page illustrated magazine, and a long list of the most remarkable cures ever made.

PROF. WELTMER.

Teaches His Method to Others.

The method of Magnetic Healing (Weltmerism), while a mysterious force, is at the same time a natural one, it is a power lying dormant in every human being brought into the world, and only needs to be brought to the surface. Prof. S. A. Weltmer in an interview stated, that any one who wished could learn this grand profession and anyone who learns it can practice it. This has been abundantly proven by the many students of the American School of Magnetic Healing, of which Prof. S. A. Weltmer is President and Prof. J. H. Kelly Secy, for students of this School are now practicing, with grand success, the healing art through Weltmerism. It can be said without hesitancy that this is the best paying profession of the age, for the students who are now practicing report that they are earning from $20 to $50 per day; this is not strange when one considers that disease is the greatest enemy of the human race. It is a foe to success, happiness and contentment, and this wonderful power known as Weltmerism dispels disease and vanquishes this foe without the aid of either medicine or the surgeon's knife; and then again, all other professions are overcrowded, while it is impossible to overcrowd a profession that cures disease, especially when statistics tell us that over eighty per cent. of the human race are suffering from diseases of every nature. Prof. S. A. Weltmer is very anxious to have others take up his noble profession and assist him in his grand work, for his method of healing has now become so famous that he must call upon others to assist him; he will, therefore, teach the method of Magnetic Healing, known as Weltmerism, to any man or woman who will write him. He will teach them by mail or personal instructions. He makes the statement that a student becomes as efficient in the curing power, as is himself in ten days' time. Any one who wishes to take advantage of this grand offer and become possessed of not only the grandest, but at the same time the best paying profession of the age, can do so by addressing Prof. J. H. Kelly, Sec'y. Nevada, Mo. who will send you full instructions free of charge.

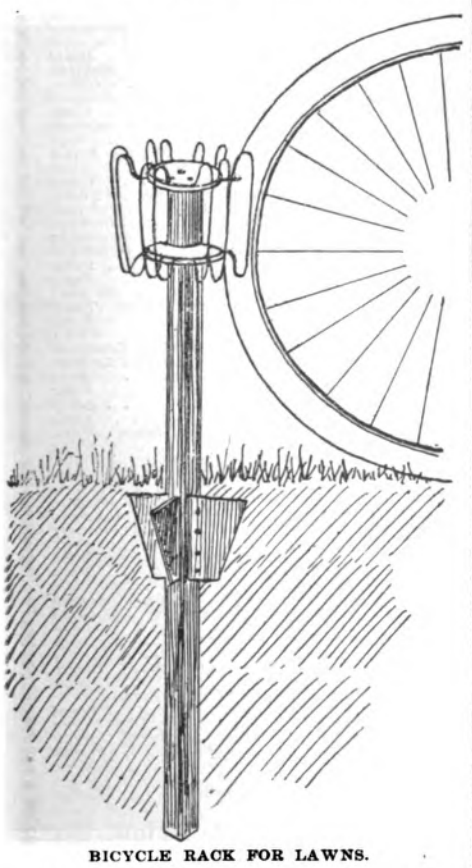
CONDUCTED BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.



IT is now the "between season"—"'twixt hay and grass" so to speak in the bicycling world. It is not exactly easy to foretell what will be most popular the coming season.

Perhaps the most remarkable of the season's features is the increase in the number of juvenile wheels in use. Only a few years ago a child of six or seven on a bicycle was a novelty. To-day there are hundreds of them in the cities. The little riders are seen mostly in the streets where they live, coursing up and down on the asphalt, doing "stunts" or playing games awheel. The parks also attract them in large numbers. Dealers say that the demand for juvenile wheels the past year is almost double that of 1898. The prominent makers have turned out a fine wheel for the youngsters. The machines are strong and durable. They have to be made strong, for curbstones and piles of debris have no terrors for the average youngster awheel.

Money in large amounts is being expended for an ideal motor, which can be applied to automobiles and launches and the bicycle, tandem and tricycle. The traveling public and the sporting world at large, are much interested in the question, and the mechanical experts and inventors are kept busy. The advocates of electricity for automobiles and launches say that they have made interesting experiments the past year, while others who prefer naphtha and kerosene make claims which they profess to be able to demonstrate when occasion requires.

Certain experiments have been made with gasolene and kerosene about which some astonishing announcements are made. It is the intention of the persons interested to make engines for automobiles, launches, bicycles and tricycles which will use either gasolene or kerosene, and the assertion is made that the engines will be small, yet do the work of engines double or triple their size. A man prominent in the cycling world has been experimenting with one of the kerosene engines in a small launch, and he says that the work done has been entirely satisfactory. He says that one of the engines placed in a carriage will not only take up little space, but when charged with kerosene will push two hundred miles under ordinary conditions, without having to be recharged. The engine in question is about thirty inches long, eight by eight inches, and has a flywheel from sixteen to eighteen inches in diameter. The machine is of about nine horse-power.

Experiments have been made with the idea of perfecting an engine not much larger than a cigar box to be attached to a bicycle or tricycle. It is the intention to make the little machine compact, strong and at the same time powerful. For the bicycle it will weigh only a few pounds, and it is intended to be used when the rider encounters a steep hill or when the wheelman is returning from a long journey and is pretty well fagged out. The little machine will have from one-half to one horsepower and kerosene will be the motor force. It is said that the little engine, in addition, will be noiseless. Its power will be equal to four or five men. The engines to be used in the automobiles and launches will be larger and more powerful.

It used to be said that American bicycle riders knew little of hill climbing except as a sought-for pastime. The statement may have been true once, but it no longer holds good. The homes and haunts of wheelmen are not in these days closely limited to city and suburban districts. Thousands of riders are now to be found in the rugged, semi-mountainous regions of New England, among the foothills of the Rocky, Blue Ridge and Alleghany Mountains, and, indeed, in all parts of this country, without special regard to topographical features.

No doubt the average dweller of the plains would find climbing of the everlasting hills an extreme hardship at first, and there is also no doubt that the wheelman whose riding is necessarily mostly composed of alternate climbing and coasting would find unchanging levels monotonous and perhaps dreary. It is a point to be noted that the rough riding of the hill regions does not appear to be harder on one's physique than continuous work on the level. An all day's ride without grades calls for unremitting if moderate exertion, while among the hills, although much harder pedalling is called for, there are also long coasts which are not only restful, but exhilarating; and if occasional walking is necessary it is not at all bad from the doctor's point of view.

An artistic bicycle rack is a thing long desired by suburban and country residents. A new one just meets the requirements. The post is light yet stout, the holders and springs are of extra length and the anchors have a firm purchase against the soil in which they are imbedded. There is no need of digging up or disturbing the sand. It is noticeable that most bicycle improvements are now artistic. Bicycle adjustable handle bars are practically universal. Never before have so many or such good bars been submitted to riders. With neat designs and having practical utility behind them very little is to be desired. A number of bicycle makers use bars of their own design, while the increase in the number of handle bar makers who supply the trade is large.

The notion that bicycling is losing favor among the masses is all nonsense. The record of sales for 1899 is an impressive negative to any such inference. It is true, however, that the grown up learners are less conspicuous than formerly. Perhaps the simple, obvious reason is analagous to the cause of the inferiority of black sheep to white sheep as producers of wool—there are not so many of them. Most of the adults know how to ride, and it has come to pass that the ranks of wheelmen are recruited mainly from the boys and girls of today.

The costliest bicycle in the world was finished at a gun factory in Vienna. It cost 500,000 gulden, which is a little more than $275,000. The owner is a rich South African diamond king and mine owner, who presented the machine to his wife on her birthday. The frame alone cost 1800 gulden, and at the last Vienna exposition it was admired by thousands. This South African nabob was so struck with the exquisite beauty of the wheel that he bought it and had it inlaid with precious stones and diamonds on every possible part.

The most important parts of a machine, from a constant rider's point of view, are the bearings of the front and driving wheels and an easy running chain. Should either become clogged with dirt or grease, the whole ease of running is lost at once, and riding instead of becoming an enjoyment, degenerates into hard work—work, too, by which no useful purpose is served. When the bearings and chains are clean, a few drops of oil, not a quantity, are all that is required every few days, once a week being generally frequent enough, unless the owner is a rider who covers his thirty or forty miles a day.

It is the legal duty of every user of the highway to exercise reasonable care in every act the consequence of which may involve the safety of the persons or the property of others. Failure to perform this duty constitutes negligence.

It is said that Thomas Willson, a Canadian electrician, was in 1892 the first man to make carbide by a method applicable commercially.

A curious case of loss of memory has been recorded. A wheelman was found lying on the ground, bleeding from a wound in his head, but could not recollect in the least how it happened.

PAUL JONES' FLAG.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE first flag of our country, the flag carried by John Paul Jones on his ship the Bon Homme Richard, is still carefully preserved in a glass case in the National Museum in Washington, D. C., and is an object of pride as well as curiosity to the crowds which daily throng the halls of the Museum.

This flag was made in Philadelphia in 177— by the Misses Mary and Sarah Austin, under the direct supervision of George Washington and Captain John Brown. It is of English bunting, two and one half yards long by one yard in width, is sewed with flax thread, and contains twelve stars arranged in four horizontal lines of three stars each, on a field of blue. There are thirteen stripes, alternately red and white. When the flag was completed it was presented to Paul Jones, who placed it on a small vessel called the Delaware, and sailed up and down the Schuylkill river to display the flag in this way to the thousands of Philadelphians who had gathered on the banks of the river to see it, and who cheered wildly and enthusiastically as it passed them fluttering from the masthead.

When Paul Jones started on his privateering trip in the Bon Homme Richard, he carried this flag floating from the masthead of his ship. During his famous fight with the British war vessel, Serapis, in the British Channel off Flambra Head, the flag was shot away and carried overboard, but Lieut. Stafford jumped into the sea, recovered it, and succeeded in regaining the ship with it. Not content with this act of daring he insisted upon climbing the rigging with it in his hand and again nailing it to the masthead, where it flaunted defiance to the enemy and waved joyfully when, at the close of the terrible engagement, the commander of the Serapis tendered his surrender and his sword to John Paul Jones.

A NEW discovery in the use of liquid air is as a medicine and anesthetic. It is claimed that it is a specific in the treatment of shingles, facial neuralgia, sciatica, and kindred diseases, and is also very helpful in the case of boils, abscesses, carbuncles, erysipelas, etc. As an anesthetic it is invaluable, as it produces local freezing of the tissues and so prevents flow of blood in surgical operations and thus gives clean work.

AND now the authorities are down on the use of explosives for Fourth of July, and it looks as if the time were coming in the near future when that great day will prove as mild and harmless, as still and noiseless as any other of the three hundred and sixty-five that go to make up the year. Cannon crackers are already tabooed in the large cities, and even the common cracker has met a like fate in some of them. And now the terrible mortality among the boys of New York from lockjaw immediately after the "Fourth", has sealed the fate of the toy pistol.

It looks as though the twentieth century would be woman's century in more ways than one. The nineteenth century saw such mighty advances along the lines of the rights of woman that it would be no great innovation did women actually use the mythical privilege of Leap Year. The twentieth century will contain twenty-four Leap Years. The first occurs in 1904 and then regularly every four years. Twenty-four reminders that she may take advantage of tradition may convince the most conservative that a change is desirable in the old saying, "Man proposes."

Hamlet is not alone in his discovery that his occupation was gone. New inventions are constantly forcing people into other occupations as well as adding new ones to the list. It is the same with amusements. What has become of the roller skate experts of a decade ago? We can all recall their astonishing exhibitions of skill but they have skated into the sea of oblivion that swallows so many amusements. The latest victims are the bicycle instructors. Two years ago there were hundreds of them in the country. They received good prices for instuction and reaped a bountiful harvest. Now it seems that every one who wished to learn to ride has done so and the bicycle instructors have sought other occupation. The rage for golf has given employment to hundreds of half-grown youngsters who trudge behind the players with the bag of clubs. They have even grown so familiar with the honors and duties of their situation as to go "on strike" recently at a fashionable club with demands for a higher price per hour. It is rather an amusing study of the rise and decrease of amusements.

There is one saint at whose shrine both saints and sinners bow—Saint Valentine. His devotees belong to no age and no country for love is a sentiment found wherever human nature manifests itself and Saint Valentine is its patron saint. There are many quaint and curious customs associated with the day but they are but forms of devotion to the little blind god in whose services Saint Valentine gained his rank. The careless modern pays his tribute no less than did the old time gallant. Our expressions of sentiment are probably more expensive than those of an earlier day, for love is a luxury in this age. Violets in silver bowls, rare orchids in ivory holders or jewel studded hearts express modern sentiment as verses encircled with elaborate paper cut work expressed that of a bygone age. The fact remains that in spite of the cynics, in spite of the materialists, Saint Valentine is worshipped to-day no less sincerely than he was in the past, for he represents a sentiment older than even human nature—the sentiment of love.

It is safe to say that the person who has followed the exciting events of the past year has added largely to his knowledge of geography. We have been interested in events in Samoa, the Hawaiian Islands, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. Many of these names did not mean even a place on a map at first, but from the atlas we have proceeded to books of travel, history and any other means that can make these places real to us. It is just as true that the Boer war has increased interest in South Africa. The whole civilized world has been surprised at the English rebuffs and correspondingly interested in literature that will throw light on the South African problem. Among the books most in demand at the libraries is to be found the following comprehensive list. The most authoritative books are Bryce's "Impressions of South Africa," Keltie's "Partition of South Africa," Theal's extensive "History of South Africa," Schreiner's "South African Question," and Stanley's "Through South Africa." Thompson's "Rhodesia" and Boon's "History of the Orange State" are good special books. "Oom Paul's People" by Hillegas, and Slatham's "Paul Krueger" are devoted especially to the Boers and their leader. Students of diplomacy have been watching Asia for the past ten years with the feeling that it was upon that continent that England would be called upon to make her struggle for supremacy. Now it seems that the Dark Continent is the one that must throw light upon England's future place as a great power.

The majority of people allowed their sympathies rather than their intellect to determine their partizanship in the Boer war. Without regard to the history of the relations of the Boer Republic with England or of the moral principles involved on either side they felt sympathy with what they considered the weaker nation. The British Empire against one small Dutch state was the feature of the case that appealed to a large majority of people. An empire covering one-fourth of the entire land surface of the globe against a nation small in territory, in wealth, in population. To say that the British reverses surprised the world is but a mild statement of a startling fact. The statement has been made that only the rebuffs of England at the time she lost her American colonies can compare with the present situation. The comparison is not fair, as England during our Revolution was involved in a great continental war and had arrayed against her France, Spain, and Holland with a threatening coalition of the Northern powers, whereas at present she has only the Boer Republic to conquer. There are other causes. First of all, England's great fighting strength is in her navy, not her army. She owns one-half of all the shipping of the world but her standing army is one of the smallest. The English Channel has separated England from the continent and prevented the necessity of great standing armies. England's army has not in recent years been called to oppose any but half civilized people armed with inferior weapons. The Boers have mustered 60,000 men, more than double the number it was estimated they could place in the field. They have all the advantage of positons. A celebrated general once said "position is nine parts of the battle." The English do not possess accurate maps of the country and have placed but 80,000 men in the field. The odds so far are vastly in favor of the Boers and they have taken all advantage of the situation. The ultimate outcome is inevitable unless a general European war is precipitated—the English must win but it is hardly such a case of power against weakness as was at first supposed.

February brings its reminder of two great typical Americans—Washington and Lincoln. February the twelfth and February the twenty-second are days whose observance as holidays typifies the great respect, veneration and love of all patriotic Americans for the memories of the men who founded and preserved our union. In all the circumstance of their outward life they were as far apart as the poles. Washington the patrician, the autocrat, and Lincoln the plain man from the ranks of the plain people. The one, courtly, dignified, reserved; the other uncouth, homely and unpretentious. Yet their names are linked in history and their deeds are written together. Many people find a pleasing mental diversion in discussing the question of what Lincoln or Washington would say of the present policy of our Government—and always with the implication that they would disapprove of our present measures in the Philippines. To make such a question a means of asserting such a conclusion is to show an entire ignorance of the public and private expressions of both Washington and Lincoln. Neither men showed inclination to precipitate strife but neither showed any hesitation as to the outcome. Loyalty to the government was the key note of both great lives. There were two sides to the moral questions that led to the Revolution and to the Civil War. The argument was not all just on the side of the American colonies or on the side of the North. But when actual war came their argument ceased and the question was simply one of loyal devotion to the nation. Washington believed the Declaration of Independence to be ill advised; Lincoln was not an abolitionist until it was forced upon him as a war measure. Two of the greatest measures of these wars were not in the minds of the great leaders at the commencement of the struggle. The one dominant idea that was in their minds was the one of loyal devotion to their country. For this the nation honors their natal days. The question "What would Washington or Lincoln do at this stage of our history?" is one that can be plainly answered by all students of the lives of these great Americans. They would be loyal to the government, first, last and all the time.

Cornell University has a new course known as a "Course in Forestry." It is the only college in the United States that is giving scientific attention to a matter that so deeply concerns the welfare of the people. Our forests are rapidly disappearing and the effect of this wholesale destruction of trees can not fail to be harmful in more ways than one. Aside from the immediate commercial effect of the lessening of timber production is the no less important result of the change in climatic conditions produced by a small forest area. Cornell has thirty thousand acres in the Adirondack Mountains secured as a forest preserve. Over one million small trees of different varieties have been planted on this land. The study of their growth will give students a practical knowledge of the trees best fitted to varied conditions of soil exposure, moisture and the like. There is little general knowledge on this subject. It has been truly said that he who plants a tree plants a hope. Many more trees would be planted if people understood the variety of tree best suited to certain soils and to certain conditions. One of the most pleasing features of European countries is the excellent system of roads bordered by miles and miles of trees. This feature is sometimes seen here and the tree shaded road makes driving a delight. With a proper stimulation of interest in tree planting and tree culture we might easily rival the great roadways of Europe as far as beauty is concerned. One of the most hopeful signs in municipal and village affairs is the appointment of tree committees. Their business is to collect information on the subject of tree planting and to recommend the planting of trees in certain places. The evergreens and the deciduous trees have individual elements of beauty and fitness. Canada has the leaf of the rock maple as her emblem, but the northern section of the United States could claim this beautiful tree with justice. In its October glory it appeals for all trees by showing the radiant beauty of one. The study in schools of tree growth and structure under the name of Nature Study cannot fail to awaken an intelligent interest in these monarchs of the forest. Any and all means that awaken an interest in trees from the standpoint of beauty should be encouraged and commended. The people have too long looked at trees through eyes trained to see "lumber" and that only.

CONSTIPATION
the frequent cause of Appendicitis and many other serious ills should never be neglected. The objection to the usual cathartic remedies is their costive reaction which increases constipation instead of curing it. PARKER'S GINGER TONIC is the proper remedy. It acts on the Liver, and when used as directed, permanently removes the constipation. 50 cts. & $1.00 at all Druggists.

ROSALIE, MY ROSALIE.

BALLAD WITH WALTZ REFRAIN.

WORDS BY FRANK HUMPHREYS. MUSIC BY ARTHUR M. COHEN.

Copyright, MDCCCXCVII, by AMERICAN MUSIC CO. Published by American Music Co., Philadelphia, Pa. Used by permission.

F. H. GILSON COMPANY, MUSIC TYPOGRAPHERS, BOSTON, U. S. A.

A NEW WALTZ SONG.

The above beautiful waltz refrain song, My Rosalie, is one of those prettily sentimental songs with the waltz time which proved so very popular just before the advent of the "coon" and "rag-time" music which have held sway for some months past. The present one was submitted to the Musical Editor of COMFORT and if it shall prove half as pleasing to others as it did to him it will indeed be a most popular piece. We are certain that it will be appreciated both by the musical and by ordinary listeners, for besides the beauty and excellence of the music itself, the sentiment of the poetry is admirable and such as will meet the popular taste. In the selection of music and songs for publication in COMFORT, it is always the intention of the paper to have only the best and what will appeal to the taste of the greater number. While no one piece will satisfy every hearer, we know that the great majority in every case has been amply satisfied with the beauty of our musical numbers.

Nothing is more discouraging at a party or any kind of company than to have some singer or player attempt to interest those present by bringing out a lot of time-worn pieces that bore every hearer. There is no excuse for this for every singer and player by taking advantage of COMFORT'S wonderful music offer found on another page, can at a trifling cost obtain the very latest and best pieces both in vocal and instrumental music. It is positively the same kind of music as is charged for by storemen at any rate from 35 to 75 cents and even more.

THE WRITER OF A SONG.

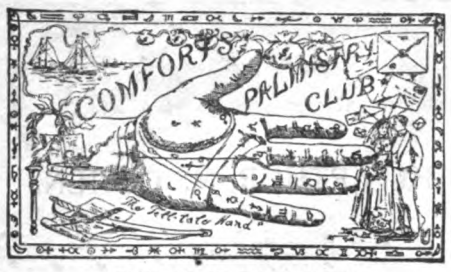
Only a short time ago the papers announced the death of Rev. Samuel F. Smith D. D., who is known to fame as the author of one of our National hymns, America. Dr. Smith however should be known as more than the author of that one hymn as he had a very eventful and busy life. He was a man of great education and had mastered several languages and was so skilled that he translated several books at different times. Fond of writing he contributed to a prolific degree to missionary and religious papers, while engaged in the heavier work of writing and editing books on similar subjects. During over forty years he was pastor in New England churches and constantly preached and traveled as a minister of the gospel.

At college he was a member of the famous class in Harvard in which graduated Holmes, Freeman Clarke and many other noted men. Here and for his lifetime he was intimate with Longfellow, Emerson and Whittier.

He held his strength remarkably to the end and was as vigorous both in body and mind as could have possibly been expected at a very advanced age. When the Endeavor Convention was in Boston he had reached the age of eighty-seven and yet was able to read the original poem to the multitude assembled with such power that every syllable was heard easily in the most remote sections.

His home was in Newton Center and from the windows of his old-fashioned New England house were the templed hills of which he wrote, while below can be seen the rocks and rills and other touches of nature that abound in the song.

Although some critical people affect to deride both the merit and art of "America," and though even its friends admit defects, the fact remains that outside this one song, with the possible exception of "The Star Spangled Banner," we have no National song, and certainly nothing has been written which shows such sense of noble patriotism ar | so thrills the soul of the listener as this beautiful poem



"To him 'twas given to touch the string
That echoed in a nation's heart."

A WONDERFUL OPPORTUNITY.

The person who looks about and sees opportunities for economy and neglects them soon reaches a place where he has nothing to economize. To-day COMFORT offers every music lover a bargain in sheet music for a nominal cost, practically the cost of packing and mailing. Those who have bought high-cost music at stores look on this either as impossible or of trying to get rid of old shop-worn pieces that cannot be sold. On the contrary this is new fresh sheet music right off the press, but made by modern machinery. We guarantee it full-size, best quality sheet music. Read the offer and send for some and have your friends do the same. If not as guaranteed and perfectly satisfactory we will refund every copper. But if you see it once you will have learned where to find the best music at an almost give away price. Read the offer and do as it suggests.

PLEASANT HOLIDAY GIFTS.

Many readers of COMFORT were able to give their friends holiday presents which both surprised and pleased the recipients. These were readers who have sent for some of the wonderful bargains in sheet music that are offered specially every month. They at once saw the worth and beauty of this music and knowing how much their friends would think of it sent a good list to them. The truth is that as soon as a person sees this regular half-dollar music and learns there is no catch or string to the price, he or she at once takes steps to secure the bargain. One can imagine how surprised one of the recipients, who fondly imagined she had received four or five dollars' worth of sheet music as a present, would have been to learn that the whole lot was procured at a cost only a trifle above the actual mailing expenses.

CONDUCTED BY DIGITUS.

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living palmists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:

Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to COMFORT PALMISTRY CLUB, Augusta, Maine.

No notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

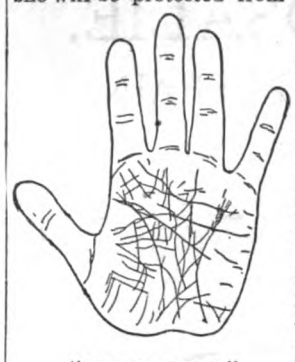
To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheet of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carefully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixatif, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an atomizer. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-greased, palm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Several minutes will be required to get this impression and great care must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putty is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixatif.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

Also, that letters not complying with them will go into the waste-basket. Readings cannot appear for several months after impressions are sent.

OWING to the fact that some parties do not fulfill all the conditions necessary to insure a prompt reading and a correct one, it is impossible for me to keep things straight at this end of the line. As stated in the September number I read the hand of "Despondent" for a certain person. Now she claims that it was not right. If she sent further impressions as she says marked "Anxiety" I cannot find them. Will she please send me new impressions and be careful that they are good ones, and mark on them the nom de plume "Anxiety" and her own full address at the same time, cutting out and attaching this paragraph? I will then give her as good a reading as I can and trust that it will be satisfactory, but she must comply with all these conditions.



"M. E. J." writes the second time asking when her hands will appear in COMFORT. They were read in the last number, January 1900. To illustrate the length of time that it takes to read the hands after impressions are once sent, I will state that the impressions read this month were all received in November, which is the earliest possible time in which they can be done. Frequently it is six months before I get to them. I tell you this in order that you may not get impatient.

The first of these fails to send any nom de plume with her impression. I will therefore take the initials of her name, which are "A. T." All the impressions she sends are from her right hand. There should have been one, at least, from the left in order that I might have it for comparison. It is a good hand, showing many fine influences rising from her life line and indicating wealth and honor in her old age. Her health will always be somewhat delicate and I do not think she will live much beyond the age of fifty. She will have some strange experiences and many perplexities in life, but somehow everything will be for the best and she will rise superior to all her troubles. She is a person of wonderful tact and uncommon ability in many ways. She makes many friends, has a very high ideal in life and will live up to it, although she will be very much admired by the opposite sex and have many love affairs. She will be married twice and I think three times and she will have many journeys. She will have the courage of her convictions in all that she does and will dare to go ahead with any scheme which she believes to be for her own good. I can see wealth and fame in her hand, although from the age of forty onward she will have some complications of an unpleasant nature. Her second marriage will be to a man of fine reputation. Her hand is peculiar in some respects and shows that she will receive the opposition of both friends and enemies, especially between the age of twenty and thirty, but she has a wonderful amount of courage and will carry everything through to a successful ending.

"A. T."

"March Hare" is to be greatly admired for the excellent impressions which she sends. I wish all my readers would take as much pains to have them plain and distinct. These impressions show a person of much ability, but rather inclined to underrate herself, i. e., she does not dare to live up thoroughly to what she knows would be best for her. She is a person of a great deal of natural ability, of artistic temperament, fond of reading, music and fine pictures. She has a great deal of tact in managing other people and considerable will power, but at the same time she is easily influenced by those for whose judgment she has respect. There is a distinct star marked on the head line of the left hand which appears with less distinctness on the right. This would indicate a bad wound on the head if it were the other way and appeared stronger in the right than it does in the left, but as it is I judge that she will be protected from that danger. She will have many things to contend with during life, not the least of which will be opposition from her friends, which will cause her more or less worry. She is ambitious, with lofty aims and these will be realized in large measure. Her life line is forked at the lower end which indicates that there will be some weakening of her forces after the age of forty-five, and she will need to guard her strength at that time. There are several lines ascending from her life line all of which point to good luck at the age indicated. She will not be likely to have many children. She will have two marriages, one at the age of twenty-five or thereabouts and the other after she is forty-five. She will have several journeys with pleasant endings and one of these, coming at the close of her life, will take her into foreign lands. On the whole her left hand is much poorer than her right and I think she will in main, have excellent luck and will make a wealthy marriage. She has occult faculties which if developed, will make her a good palmist or even clairvoyant reader.

"MARCH HARE."

"Treble" sends his hands without fixatif and they are not very badly rubbed, although they are somewhat. As I have often repeated in this column, it is impossible to send them through the mails without the use of fixatif so but what they will rub, as even the motion of shaking them about rubs off the smoke. His is an excellent hand showing an upright, straightforward character, which can be depended upon at all times. He will make a splendid business man on this account and also because he has sufficient faith in himself and perseverance to carry out whatever seems best. He has a strong constitution and will be well up to a very old age with the exception of a time about the age of thirty to thirty-five when either a severe illness or an accident will befall him. He recovers from that and soon after has a streak of good luck. He will be nearly, if not quite, a hundred years old. He will marry not far from the age of thirty, will get an excellent wife, but he will outlive her. I do not think he will marry the second time. He will have several successful journeys in his life and will be much esteemed wherever he lives. His hand is an exceptionally good one all the way through. He will rise by his own efforts to fame and to a degree of wealth.

"TREBLE."

The others which I have on hand will have to be deferred until next month.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE HEALING.

ONE MILLION CURED CASES.

You Can Be Cured Whether You Believe in Christian Science or Not.

Over a million cases of disease in every form are now to the credit of Christian Science Healing. Most of these were cases that the doctors had given up as "incurable." Many more were chronic maladies that had baffled their skill for years. All were cured quickly, some were cured instantly. The evidence on these facts is simply indisputable and the curing still goes on. There can be no mistake or misstatement about it. The healers and their work are in the public view. As a C. S. healer my many marvelous cures have startled the world. During the past 13 years I have healed diseases of almost every known kind and in every stage of severity. They included many surgical cases where operations were otherwise threatened. I cured cases that were far away from me, as well as those near at hand. And I tell you in like manner that wherever you may dwell, and whatever be your bodily ailment, or whether one or many physicians have failed to give you relief, if you report the case to me and so desire, you shall be cured. This is no vain or idle promise. My past success fully justifies it. You can be cured whether you believe in Christian Science or not. You can be cured whether in this city or thousands of miles away from me. In our Christian Science Healing distance is of no account; disbelief is not any hindrance; disappointments of the past only make stronger grounds for hope. All you really need is the wish to be healed.

I have just published a little book in regard to this blessed truth called, "A Message of Health and Healing." If you write to me I will gladly send you a COPY FREE. It gives many interesting facts and convincing testimonials. Enclose 2-cent stamp for postage.

A GENEROUS OFFER!

George B. Wright Discovers a Cure for Lost Manhood and Sends it Free to Every Sufferer Who Will Write For It.

Gratitude is one of the noblest impulses of the human heart, and in few instances has this fine quality been so conspicuously exemplified as in the case of George B. Wright, of Marshall.

Mr. Wright is a merchant and well known citizen of Marshall, Mich., who was permanently cured of lost manhood and nervous debility after declining health for years. He now devotes his life to helping other men who suffer as he once suffered. Mr. Wright offers to send the medical prescription that effected a cure in his case to every reader of COMFORT who is suffering to-day as he suffered. All who will drop him a letter asking for a copy of the prescription will receive it by return mail free of charge.

The following editorial by A. N. Tally, M. D., regarding Mr. Wright's prescription for lost manhood, appeared in the December 1899 issue of the United States Health Reports, published at Washington, D. C.:

We, as the highest American authority on all matters of Health, Sanitation and Hygiene, are constantly receiving letters of inquiry about a reliable cure for lost strength in men.

Therefore we have ordered an investigation to be made into the subject and our Medical Staff found there were many so-called cures on the market but that many were worthless and some actually harmful. Therefore when we came upon the prescription furnished free by George B. Wright, a merchant of Marshall, Michigan, we instituted a most thorough laboratory examination and found that its wonderful efficacy depended upon its being exactly compounded according to proper chemical requirements in order to establish the proper chemical actions and reactions in the human system and that it should especially, and above all, contain each and every ingredient named in the prescription, otherwise it would be quite inactive and worthless.

Properly mixed and containing everything called for in the prescription, its effect upon the nerve centers is truly wonderful and its nerve tonic properties easily surpassed all ordinary methods of medication.

Among the benefactors of the race may be mentioned the said George B. Wright, inasmuch that he gives this grand discovery free to all who write for it.

Taken according to directions it builds up the weak and restores to full size and vigor the nerve muscles. It brings hope and cheer and lifts up the discouraged man so that he once more enjoys the beauties of nature and the pleasures of life. Failure in business and love surely falls upon him who is weakened physically and mentally and this sad condition is at once relieved and a new man made of him who uses this prescription.

G. B. WRIGHT.

Therefore, upon the highly favorable report of our Medical Staff we extend to George B. Wright's Prescription for Lost Manhood the full editorial and official endorsement of the United States Health Reports.

As certain as a wound leaves a scar, and as sure as effect follows cause, do men live to repent their follies and indiscretions in weakness and suffering. The tortured sufferer may bear no tell-tale marks of ruin upon his face to betray his lost manhood. He goes to his grave a human wreck, and never tells of his sufferings for fear of shame. Such mental anguish at times drives him to the verge of desperation, and he is easy prey for those vultures in human form—quack doctors—who hold out alluring hopes of cure only to disappoint, and after robbing him of his money, plunge him into absolute despair.

No one can appreciate these horrors of lost manhood except he who has suffered them. No one can help such sufferers except he who knows a cure and has himself been restored to full manhood. A notable cure of lost manhood in an extreme case was effected in the person of George B. Wright, a music dealer and well known citizen of Marshall, Mich. Mr. Wright for years suffered the agony of lost vital power. He saw his physical power go from him as the result of insidious disease, until he was reduced to a condition of senility, and the best doctors in the country gave him up to die.

Like many others, he tried the various remedies offered by specialists for the treatment of weaknesses peculiar to men, and it was this experience that drove him to a little study and research for his own benefit.

He asserts that his 10 years' suffering, both mentally and physically, was turned to unbounded joy in a single night through a rare combination of medicines that literally made him young again. It is the prescription of this discovery that his enthusiasm leads him to offer free to any man, young or old, who feels that his animation or the fire of ambition has left him and needs something that will brace him up and enable him to be prepared for any undertaking which may present itself.

There is no question but what in his individual case the results were just as described, and it seems quite probable that any man who believes himself to be weak may profit by sending for his free prescription. Many people wonder how he can afford to send this prescription free, but it costs him little to do so, and he feels a philanthropic interest in giving weak men an opportunity to cure themselves.

A request to G. B. Wright, music dealer, Box 855, Marshall, Mich., for his free prescription, will be promptly and privately complied with by return mail.

A NEW ENGLAND MINE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

One DOES not expect to find mines in New England, and yet there is a mine far up among the Berkshire Hills in Western Massachusetts, which although it was discovered less than twenty years ago, has made its owner many times a millionaire. This mine is in the town of Rowe; but the village of five hundred inhabitants which has grown up around the mouth of the shaft is called Davis, after the name of the man who discovered the mine and owns it.

The ore which is dug out here is iron pyrites, more commonly known as "sulphur ore," because it contains a large per cent. of sulphur. To look at, it would seem to be a rock made up of dark gray sand and flakes of gold tightly glued together. One name for it is "fool's gold," because so many people have been deluded by its glitter into mining for gold where gold could never be found.

Sulphur ore is used for making sulphuric acid, for which the demand in this country has increased enormously during the last ten years, especially for use in making fertilizers. This is partly due to the lower price at which the acid can be made since it was found possible to make it from iron pyrites ore. Until this was known the acid was made from brimstone, all of which had to be imported. There is hardly a farmer in the whole United States, now, who is not indebted for a part of his success on the farm to the man who discovered how to use this ore.

When iron pyrites ore is pure it contains 53 per cent. of sulphur and 47 per cent. of iron, but it is rarely found pure. Most ore contains lead, zinc, copper and arsenic. The ore from the mine at Davis is more pure than that from many other places, and as it contains no arsenic makes a pure white acid, such as is made from brimstone. This is not only the only one of the kind in New England, but it is almost the only one of the kind in the United States. There are also mines in Canada and in other parts of the world. The owner of the mine at Davis also owns a similar mine in Spain.

No acid is made at Davis. The ore is sold and shipped all over the country to firms who manufacture it into acid to suit themselves. The acid is made by burning the ore in furnaces. As it is heated the sulphur passes off in fumes similar to those one smells when a match is lighted. These fumes are collected and subjected to a process which condenses the acid from them. If the fumes from a match are allowed to strike a flower or a leaf they make the part of a plant lose its color and wither, so deadly are the effects of the fumes upon vegetation. In some places where great quantities of the ores are burned so much of this gas escapes that all the trees and plants for a considerable distance around are blighted and killed. As no ore is burned at Davis, though, this unfortunate effect does not follow there, and it would be hard to find a more beautiful place than this mining hamlet among the Green Mountains.

The story of the way in which the mine was discovered is interesting. For a great many years the farmers who have lived in Rowe have noticed that there were odd-looking rocks in some parts of the town, and people who have been there have seen specimens gathered as curiosities or for their mere beauty. In 1881 a New England man who was in New York City happened to see a piece of rock lying on the desk of Mr. H. J. Davis, a man who had been prospecting and mining in different parts of the country for several years. This man told Mr. Davis that he knew where there was a lot of rock like the piece on the desk. As a result of this conversation Mr. Davis came to Massachusetts with the man, and was guided by him to a place in the town of Rowe where, among the boulders washed clean by the waters of a brook flowing through a pasture was one rock which glittered in the sunlight with the particles which people call "fool's gold."

After Mr. Davis had seen this boulder he obtained permission from the man who owned the farm through which the brook ran, to dig down into the ground to see if he could find more, and if he did to blast out enough to load a car to be sent away as a sample. The report which came back from this carload was so favorable that a part of this man's farm was bought, and mining begun in good earnest. Since then several of the adjoining farms have been bought, and a village with schoolhouse, store, boarding house, tenement houses and several good residences, has been built.

The mine is now down to a depth of nearly a thousand feet. Its annual yield is about 60,000 tons of ore a year, which makes about a freight-train load for each working day. The ore is drilled and blasted, compressed air being used to work the drills. The ore comes to the surface in lumps about as big as a man's head, and is broken up by hand, the men who do this work using long-handled steel hammers. It is more profitable to have this work done by hand because the ore sells for the highest price when broken into pieces about the size of an egg. If broken by machinery too much of the ore is crushed. The advantage of having the ore in this size is that it can then be burned on an iron grate, through which the heat passes. All of the ore which is too small for this size, and so would fall between the bars of the grate, is sent to a mill called the "crusher," and ground to a powder about like coarse sand. This is burned on slabs made of fire-clay, but as the process is much more expensive than that of burning on grates, the fine ore cannot be sold for as much as the coarse.

The men who work in the mine are all Italians, and many of those who work on the surface are of the same nationality. The village of Davis is therefore a sort of "little Italy," built up among the mountains of Massachusetts. Not very many of these men have families, because most Italians do not plan to stay in this country only long enough to save two or three thousand dollars with which they intend to go back to Italy, and buy a farm on which they can settle down and live rich for all the rest of their lives. There are enough of the men who have families, though, so that there is a school in which nearly all of the twenty-five pupils are Italian children. When these children first begin to come to school it is rarely that any of them can talk a word of English. Think how odd the work of a teacher must be whose first task is to teach her pupils to talk the English language.

The men are steady and industrious, and very saving of their wages. The village is quiet for a mining settlement. The men drink large quantities of beer and liquor, which they send away and buy by the keg, but they never get quarrelsome and the long distance which they are removed from any city seems to have freed them from the unfavorable influence which crowding men together often seems to produce. They are a musical and pleasure-loving community, having grounds arranged for playing various out-door games, a band-stand and a queer artificial summer garden, made by setting up small trees and the branches of larger trees around a level wooden floor, on which they gather to dance, drink and eat in the shade of the trees which they have tied up to the frame around the floor. The entrance to this garden is through a long, neatly covered and shady arbor.

Davis is four miles from Charlemont, a station on the Fitchburg railroad, eight miles east of the Hoosac Tunnel. All of the ore has to be drawn to Charlemont to be loaded onto the cars. It takes twenty teams working all of the time, the year around, to draw the ore.

Thirty Minutes is a short time, but many have earned one of these watches in less time than that. It is one of the very best watches for time ever offered to our readers at no matter what the price asked for it. We know, of course, there are watches that cost more money, because they are in gold or silver cases, but they will not keep any better time, simply because they cannot. This watch keeps not perfect time, we never saw the watch that did, but it keeps as near perfect time as watches usually do. We have such faith in this watch as a timekeeper that we send with every one a guarantee just as binding as that given with any watch, no matter what make. We are willing to give you this watch if you will do us a slight service, which you can easily do in an hour. We wish to increase our subscription list, and we want the assistance of every reader of this paper to that end. We do not want you to do it for nothing, we will reward you for it. You can easily secure this valuable watch if you get four subscribers to this paper, at our special subscription price of 25 cents a year each. Do this, sending us $1.00, with the names of four subscribers to this paper, and we will send our paper to each subscriber for one year, and we will send you the watch to reward you for your efforts in our behalf. Start out now and see what you can do. Remember we guarantee every watch. If you get five subscribers and send us $1.25 for the same we will also send you a nice chain. Address

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE question which confronts mothers of girls when they get into their teens, is the comparative value of the boarding school and the regular grammar and High school course. The aim of the average girl's education is to fit her for domestic life, and all things being equal, the girl with the broadest culture and the most accomplishments lives the fullest life and is in touch with the most people. If a girl associates with only one set of people, her growth will be in the same general direction as is theirs. With new surroundings, new instructors and new friends come new ideas, and a better knowledge of how people in different circles and under different atmospheres live, and this is a powerful mental stimulant. Often unsuspected talents manifest themselves which would never have received special thought under other conditions. There can be no doubt as to benefits of the boarding school from a mental standpoint. But the taking of a girl out of her home environment at this age, from fourteen to seventeen, is a risky thing to do, unless the girl is naturally self-reliant and has been well-trained by her mother. The great point in favor of this course, is the inevitable result which must come to a girl from being under strict discipline, for any disposition toward untidy habits is quickly nipped in the bud, and the girl who has to daily put up with untidy habits in her roommate will not fall into these bad ways herself.

There is no possible doubt as to the good effect upon a girl who is in this way thrown upon her own resources so far as the daily care of her room, wardrobe, recreations etc., is concerned, and it is a remarkably good thing to let a girl get away from her mother's care in this direction, for a time, for mothers are prone to do all those little things for their daughters which should be left for them to do, after they get to be twelve years old, often forgetting that they have arrived at the age when they should take the responsibility of their own wardrobes and rooms, m nding and repairing their own clothes. Some sensible mothers have their daughters do the family mending every other week, at least, and this brings to them the knowledge of all kinds of patching and darning which is such a useful thing to be able to do. Unless there is a possibility of a college course for a girl, or a long course of travel to take her away from home and thus develop her, a girl who is sent away to boarding school between the ages of fourteen and eighteen is a much better equipped girl for entering society and meeting all grades of people as she will be obliged to do, than the one who has simply lived in her own home and seen little of people outside her own immediate neighborhood which comprises her school and church friends.

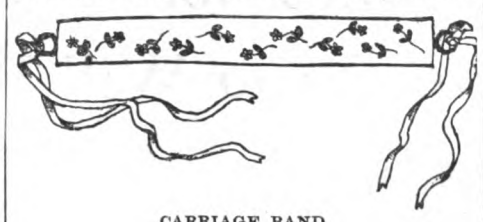
We came across, the other day, a bag for holding embroidery, and as it is easily made, and possibly a new idea to some of the readers of this department, we show two illustrations of it—one open, and the other closed.



The bag is made from a fancy silk handkerchief of rather large size, and the bags are more durable when made from dark colored ones, also prettier, as the contrast is stronger between the silk and the lace which is used on the edge. First sew all around, on the edge, some lace about two inches deep. This may be put on plain with fullness simply at the corners, or may be fulled all the way, making a ruffle, which adds to the dainty and dressy appearance of the bag. Cream or ecru lace is preferred. Then take a tuck, in a circle, about midway between the center and edges of the handkerchief, running through this tuck two pieces of narrow ribbon for a draw string, to come out at opposite sides, using ribbon to match some tint in the handkerchief. This is all there is to it, and yet it is very effective. May also be used as a bag for duster, to hang on a door knob, or on a chair back.

CLOSED.

Our other illustration shows a carriage band. This is one of the new things in the shops and is very useful and dainty. For a baby carriage, of course, and particularly useful in the go-carts so much used now by children old enough to sit up.

The band is made of ribbon two inches wide, and one-half yard is enough. Have stamped on one-half of this some sprays of forget-me-not—which seems to be the baby's flower—and embroider and press the same. Then cut a strip of white wadding, two inches wide and nine inches long and baste onto the wrong side of the embroidered part, folding over onto the wadding the other end of the ribbon. Sew the edges of the front and back part of ribbon together, also end, over and over. Have two brass rings about the size of a penny, and crochet them with silk the shade of that used in the flowers in the embroidery. Sew one ring to each end of the bands. Then tie into the rings, one yard into each, some half inch ribbon of a shade to match rings, leaving the ends free. These ends, of course, tie into the arms of the carriage, and the baby is well fastened in, and her appearance is much improved by the use of the pretty band in place of the usual leather strap.

JOIN THE MUSIC CLUB.

25 Cents Pays for a Full Membership.

If you ever buy sheet music you really cannot afford not to join the Music Club.

The objects of the Music Club are, 1st: In behalf of its members to furnish them with one of the latest songs or instrumental pieces each month without cost. 2d: In behalf of the music publishers, to place in the hands of club members the latest song or composition of real merit, which deserves popularity. 3d: In behalf of its promoters to realize a small profit from membership fees, and additional music sold to members at club prices.

Every one may not be aware that a great many copies of every popular song or composition are given away by the publishers before the piece becomes sufficiently popular and well known to command a ready sale. That this is a fact any candid publisher will readily admit. It is, however, very necessary that these advance copies shall be placed judiciously in the hands of people who will appreciate the real merit of the composition.

The promoters of the Music Club have guaranteed to the music publishers the high character of its members, and that new music placed in their hands will be intelligently considered and favorably mentioned where the actual merit of the piece warrants it.

All subscribers to COMFORT—but no others—are eligible to membership in the Music Club, and become full members on the payment of the club fee of 25 cents, which also includes a subscription to COMFORT.

All the club members receive on the first of each month a copy of an entirely new and original song or other musical composition, regular sheet music, such as sells at 40 to 50 cents per copy. This gives to club members twelve of the latest and best pieces of sheet music published, at a total cost of but 25 cents for membership fee.

The Music Club also furnishes to members, sheet music of every description at one-half the regular price, and frequently for less

HERE is a chance to use your Brains and Win $500.00 in Gold. We want you to try and arrange these 20 jumbled letters printed in the block square to the left which properly arranged will spell the names of 3 large cities in the World, two of these cities being in the United States, the other one being a Mexican City. In making the 3 names the letters can only be used as many times as they appear and no letter can be used which does not appear. After you have found the 3 correct names you will have used every letter in the 20 exactly as many times as it appears. If you cannot find the 3 correct names but only find 2, you will receive a special prize for your trouble worth $1. If you answer this puzzle at once you will not be disappointed. Some one is going to win the money and it may be you. Anyway it does not cost you any money to try. All we ask is that should you be a successful contestant and win a prize that you will secure for us one yearly subscriber to our Handsome Illustrated Monthly Magazine. This we can truthfully say is the very hardest puzzle ever advertised, so get out your Geography and look for these 3 cities. The correct names are only known to the President of this Company. The envelope containing the three names has been sealed and deposited with a leading Banking Co. in Boston, and will only be opened up the day after the contest closes, April 26th. This we believe is the only honest way of conducting a contest, as everyone has an equal chance. In case more than one person succeeds in finding the three correct names we will divide the money equally. In addition to the $500.00 in gold we will give you an opportunity to Win

$5.00 A WEEK FOR LIFE FREE

WITHOUT ANY LABOR OR EXPENSE.

We are going to give to some one who has entered this contest and who complies with the conditions as stated above an opportunity to win and secure from us without any labor or expense on their part $5 every week during their natural life. We mean just what we say. There is no deception and no trickery about this offer. If you are the lucky one, and we hope you are, for some one will get it, we will send the winner every week during their natural life $5, or else $250 every year in advance for life, whichever way they prefer. Do not throw this contest aside and say, Oh, pshaw! I have answered puzzles before and never got anything, or else only secured a few cents for my trouble, for if you do this you will regret it as long as you live. Someone is going to win the money, and it may be you. No one can tell, anyway it does not cost you one cent, as we do not want any money from you. Are the prizes worth trying for? We think they are, for $5 a week paid to you for life will keep one from the Poorhouse, and to those who have a small income, it will supply them with many a necessity which one has to do without in these hard times. Of course we are strangers to you, and you have no assurance except our word that we are financially able to carry out the promises we make. If you have the least doubt, we would be pleased to have you write to the Federal Trust Co., of Boston, one of the largest banking houses here, to whom we refer by permission of their honorable President. We are a responsible company, with a paid up capital of one hundred thousand dollars, composed of honorable and well known business men of Boston. We want to secure a large list of subscribers to our Magazine, and will leave no stone unturned to accomplish by honest methods only, our object. Every one entering this contest will receive honest treatment, and you will have the same chance whether you live in California or Massachusetts. Distance makes no difference. After you have carefully arranged the twenty jumbled letters into the three cities which you think are right, send your answer to us at once, enclosing a two-cent stamp for reply and you will immediately receive an answer telling you whether you will be entitled to a prize, and also send you full particulars how you can win $5 a week for life. WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

IF all predictions come true we are to have a host of beautiful new things for Spring. First of all are the skirts; single-pleats, box-pleats, kilt pleats, accordian pleats and every other sort of pleat ever known to man. The wise woman will conclude at once that it will be a difficult season for the home-dressmaker; for all these pleats are hard to lay and still harder to keep in shape. However, they are the latest cry and every blessed woman who can will have at least one skirt of this style. Habit back and fan-pleated back have entirely given over to the box-pleated back, as suggested in the sketch. The pleat graduates from the belt to the hem, and is often fancifully stitched or embroidered. It has proven a very becoming finish to the back of a skirt, emphasizing as it does the clinging custom.

While they are fresh in my mind I would like to tell you about some dreams of ball gowns to be worn at a smart New York function in the near future. One is blue, just like a glimpse of blue sky in the summer, hazy and soft; the long, trailing skirt is de chene, so soft the entire skirt could be drawn through the half-closed hand. Over this beautiful material is scattered creamy lace roses of quite large size, the edges of each outlined with a minute ruching of blue tulle. At the foot are billows of tulle and yellow lace of an open design matching the roses on the silk. A feature of this skirt are the pieces, back and front, which extend up over the waist, giving the effect of a Princess. What can be seen of the low bodice is composed of inch-wide straps of blue broadcloth set together with lace roses of a smaller size than those used on the skirt. A second perfect gown, is pink Liberty satin, and as it is intended for a slim figure, shirrings are used instead of pleats. The skirt has the outer part lifted at the back and caught into a group of shirrs giving a slightly draped effect. At the foot, over several flaring flounces of creamy net trimmed with rows of pink velvet ribbon is an applique of heavy white lace, the opening filled with ruchings of pink tulle. The tiny bodice made me think of a rose with its tiny shirrings alternate of tulle and satin. Shaded satin roses edge the shoulders, made to look very natural by means of drops of pearls looking like dew.

A broadcloth ball gown sounds most incongruous, and yet made over a silk drop skirt it is neither heavy nor cumbersome, and the clinging lines of the woolen fabric are most effective, revealing all the beauties of a good figure—producing in fact, a tailor-made evening girl. The question has been brought up frequently as to what constitutes the difference between a ball and a dinner gown. It is rather difficult to tell at first glance, for a large majority of the dinner gowns are quite elaborate enough to wear at a dance, although it may properly be very much plainer than a dancing frock. For instance, long sleeves are seen in most of the dinner gowns and are considered very smart, while for a ball gown they are not considered good style. A gown of gray white panne velvet, cut very low in the neck and quite off the shoulders, has a very odd pair of sleeves of the velvet that start below the straps of lace over the shoulder. These sleeves are unlined, are very long, and have rather the effect of mousquetaire gloves the same shade as the gown, for they are loose enough to wrinkle on the arms, although they are fitted as snugly as gloves. Of course these sleeves may be taken out if desired, and the gown is then smart enough for a ball gown.

Butterfly brooches and hair ornaments are quite the fad. They make charming bonnet pins to gleam in the heart of a big chiffon choux, to fasten the tulle ties of the dressy hat, or to glisten among the folds of the lace cravat. The loveliest of these butterflies are tinted and gemmed to suit one's special style of beauty. A butterfly made for an April maiden, is of pale enamel with rays of gold slanted across the wings, which are studded with diamonds.

Coral necklaces are much in vogue, and for the cotton shirt waists are sets of studs of coral to match. It is a dainty idea to follow the color in the waist; coral with pink, and turquoise with blue.

A novel idea in belts is shown by a well-known New York milliner. It is an arrangement of ribbon with pulleys and attachments at the back for holding the skirt in place without the use of pins. They have a tendency to make the waist appear longer, and by means of the pulleys the size certainly can be reduced considerably.

A feature of the spring tailor gown will be its trimming of taffeta bands, some several inches in width while the narrower bands will be more commonly used. Bands an inch wide are used to overlap all the seams in the smart little coats, and to outline the edge of the jacket as well as to trim the sleeves. Often the bands are stitched in rows with a color to match or with white, making a sharp contrast. Almost like a bolt from the blue have sprung into our midst spots—large, small, medium—tumbling one over the other like the starry heavens, or placed at regular intervals wide apart. Light cloths are spotted with black velvet, as are satins and silks, while as for spotted velvets, they are legion. One lovely pattern was broken up by little lines of dashes; doubtless the idea was borrowed from a foulard, but expressed in black velvet on a delicate mastic cloth it was at once invested with a delightful element of novelty.

In making these spotted stuffs up the monotony is relieved by mixing with plain material, possibly in the guise of an underskirt and sleeves, for contrasting sleeves are rather catching onto popular favor again.

Only a little time ago we were convinced of the beauty and suitability of the short French corset, and now there is another cry to which those of you who aim to be in the van of fashion will do well to listen seriously. This new corset owns for its chiefest feature, a perfectly straight busk, the waist, that is to say, directly in the front, being not in any way defined, and the cut over the hips is remarkably short, leaving full play there, while it seems to be a matter of choice altogether whether at the top they are quite low or only moderately so. I must not forget to tell you a few interesting details of the suspender. Under the new regime of the straight busk, this is clasped to the edge of the corset on both sides of the front, the straps fastened to the stockings, gaining the double end of supporting the hosiery and holding down the stomach.

Blouses and spencer waists are to have absolutely flat backs, neither pleats nor tucks, nor yoke, nor yet anything being permitted to break the monotony of the plain surface. It is only by diligent attention to these small details that we are granted the privilege of the loose waist. On new sleeves there is a distinct leaning toward tiny flat epaulettes. These are generally cut in one with the shoulder piece; then revers are generally double or rippled, and so lend a becoming breadth to the figure.

A quite novel epaulette had its dividing seam accentuated by tiny buttons and was very pretty and chic.

Speaking of buttons reminds me of another waist that owes its success to a yoke of velvet, ostensibly buttoned on to the under part of some soft woolen material, which was slightly eased. Small yokes, too, outlined by strappings, the mitred ends whereof are crossed and held with buttons are very effective, and again, a noteworthy feature will be contrasting colors of panne velvet with revers of the same. I am glad to see that the actual silk shirt waist, with linen collar and cuffs, is far in the past. Though simple silk shirts are worn they are not now considered at all smart unless accompanied by pretty lace turnover collars and soft stock ties. So many people make the mistake of having a silk shirt too tight. When one is not comfortable there can be no beauty.

How many years ago were boleros invented, or, rather, introduced into our favor? Their decease has been prognosticated for a long time yet they flourish and abound as merrily as ever and are likely to be even more popular, with forms so varied that all requirements can be satisfied. Much stitching and braiding is to be seen, especially when collars and revers give opportunity for such decoration. But one thing is imperative, that the bolero or Eton are of the same material as the skirt, no different fabric or coloring are permissible. Facings of other materials, of course, are introduced, and cloth upon cloth, differing in color only, is a feature of tailor-built costumes of to-day, the costume in which the bolero plays such an important part. The smart little Eton sketched here has an oddity, inasmuch as it has a short point at the back while the fronts are no longer than the sides. It has a coat collar of velvet and revers rolling open to the edge of the jacket. The velvet applique is set on in girdle fashion, a form of garniture sure to be much in vogue.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all Throat and Lung Affections; also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who wish it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. IN THE ANTARCTIC.

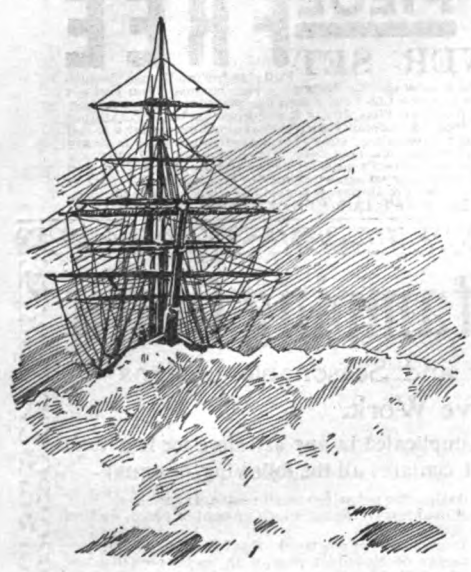
WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

ANTARCTIC adventure is never without interest to the world. Its hardships and its privations awake in the human breast an admiration and sympathy which no other trials can. Then, too, there is a mystery and a symbolism about the northern pole of our sphere which attracts every one whose imagination is not blunted with over civilization. But now, in these latter days explorers, looking for new worlds to conquer, turn toward the other end of the earth's axis, and find there a wonderland more marvelous than any at the north, and a continent of such area that years will pass before the civilized world can know of its extent and wonders.

Up to the present time little has been known of the far southern seas. The Antarctic Ocean is far removed from all the continents inhabited by civilized nations. South America and Africa as they approach the south narrow to mere points, and Australia is too far from the cold southern sea to be closely interested in its attractions. Until within a few years none but whaling vessels had visited the Antarctic Ocean; but scientists and geographers now believe that within its limits, more than in any other part of the earth, important work of exploration must be accomplished. To this end several expeditions are now being fitted out, one from England and one from Germany. It is hoped that these will work together and thus accomplish much valuable work.



Two years ago a Belgian expedition was sent out, remaining two years in southern waters, but they did not succeed in landing upon the southern continent.

More successful, however, was the expedition under the leadership of Borchgrevinck, which sailed from England in the summer of 1898. The ship chosen for the trip was the "Southern Cross" and it was carefully fitted out to brave the dangers of frigid seas. Mr. Borchgrevinck had already had some experience in Antarctic waters and had, in fact, landed on Victoria Land five years before, though he had been unable to explore as he wished.

One must remember that the seasons, in that far away climate, occur at exactly opposite times from ours, so that on Dec. 19, 1898, the "Southern Cross" left Hobart Town, Tasmania, that it might get through the ice pack during the summer heat of December and January. In about two weeks she sighted the great ice pack, sparkling with the irridescence of the frozen regions. Some of the pack was composed of floes several miles in length and the channels between them were narrow. The "Southern Cross" entered one of these dangerous openings and for six weeks encountered terrible dangers constantly. The ice packed and jammed on all sides and piled up about the vessel until it seemed that she must go to pieces. At one time she was fairly buried in ice, great blocks rising to the level of the deck.

The middle of February found the brave party and their staunch craft in open water off Cape Adair, Victoria Land. After waiting for terrific gales to subside, a landing was made in Robertson Bay. Here, with great difficulty were landed stores and material for huts.

Cape Adair is a promontory a thousand feet high, from which the snow is blown as it falls, leaving bare the rocks and boulders which compose it. So strong are the winds from the south that great rocks were blown from this mountain to the ship's deck during a cyclone. Two of the party succeeded in reaching the summit of this mountain, but only with the most terrible suffering in the face of a terrific gale. Three distinct kinds of moss were found on the ascent, exactly like the reindeer moss of the north. Near the bottom of the mountain the party made a valuable discovery. It was a vein of quartz, milky with blue streaks in it and very heavy, and had every indication of being gold bearing quartz.

Huts were built near the shore and everything made ready for winter. Already valuable scientific observations had been made and the zoological collections had been begun with over one hundred rare birds' skins, and a new species of seal had been discovered.

On February 27, 1899, the "Southern Cross" departed for the north, leaving behind ten brave men, who were determined to accomplish much before the world heard from them again. They, with their dogs, would explore the southern continent, take observations of phenomena seen only in the far southern seas, and collect specimens of those animals and plants which are as yet unknown to the world.

Soon the ship will go south again and bring back the sturdy adventurers, who were willing to risk their lives that man might know better this earth on which he lives.

The Story of an Arrowhead.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THIS is a bit of chipped stone with a history! It was picked up on the prairies of Kansas where its last owner had dropped it as he flew over the plains on his fleet pony. That owner was no ordinary Indian but a chief of some repute and he knew where to go for his arrowheads. Far to the south, into Arizona, he journeyed and there he knew a spot where stone already chipped, might be had for the taking, and in such abundance that his tribe would be supplied for generations. Brush the dust and mud from the arrowhead and what do we find? A beautful bit of moss agate with the delicate tracing of an ancient plant within its stony center. This plant grew perhaps a million years ago in the Arizona forest, now a petrified forest. Most of us have seen bits of petrified wood but how many Americans know of the Petrified Forests of Arizona. Their history goes far, far back to the time when that whole region was a wooded plain near the sea. Slowly the land sank beneath the surface of the water. Year after year the mineral matter in the water (and there was abundance of it) soaked into the wood taking the place of the woody fiber. Now the forces of nature were reversed and the rocky forest, together with the clay and sandstone in which it was imbedded, was raised out of the sea to its present height thousands of feet above sea level.

TREE PETRIFIED INTO AN AGATE BRIDGE.

As the years passed by the wind and rain wore away the surrounding rock and to-day that ancient forest stands revealed to us but it is the forest of olden times only in form. Take an axe and attempt to fell one of the trees and all about you will fly chips of flint, of agate or of smoky quartz. These are the chips which our Indian chief treasured for arrowheads. These stone logs are sometimes three or four feet in diameter and a cross section shows the rings, fibers and bark of the ancient tree. It is possible to cut slices from these trees and this material is highly valued for table tops and house decorations. Tiffany, in New York, has several articles made from this petrified wood and their price speaks for the value that is placed upon such rare articles. The stone is very hard and brittle and is difficult to cut, an ordinary stone saw together with diamond dust being the instrument used.

In several parts of the Petrified Forest the trees have fallen, or rather they fell in the long ages before man came on earth, and these fallen trunks often span a deep chasm beneath, forming bridges of solid agate, over which one may cross from side to side of what may have been an ancient stream. Cutting and polishing this wood is the work of many of the inhabitants of these regions, and because it is capable of such a brilliant polish it is becoming very valuable for jewelry as well as other decoration. But to the Indian of a century ago these "wood piles" were of value for the sharp edged chips which the weather has torn from the trees.

In some parts of the forest are masses of the wood showing most wonderful crystals and delicate colors of topaz and amethyst which are of great value as mineralogical specimens.

WOMEN GET RICH AS WELL AS MEN

How One Woman Makes $18.00 to $40.00 a Week.

Many women say it is hard to get along in the world because they do not have the chance to make money that men do. I disagree with them, for I am perfectly independent since starting in business a few months ago, and never make less than $18.00 a week, and often as much as $40.00. I am selling Baird's Non-Alcoholic Flavoring Powders, which are much superior and cheaper than the liquid extracts sold in stores. Before starting I wrote to the Baird Mfg. Co., 136 Baird Bldg., Pittsburg, Pa., and obtained samples which we tried in cakes, candies, custards and ice cream at our church sociable. Everything was so delicious that I wrote for the agency at once, and had no trouble in establishing a regular trade with my neighbors, which only occupies the time I can spare from household duties. The manufacturers say they will employ any earnest person, man or woman, who can spare all or part of their time, and I can say I never heard of such an easy way to make money. MRS. W——.

$1,000 SALARY PER YEAR. Ladies or Gentlemen. We have shared the general prosperity of the country, and we now need one or two permanent representatives in each state to look after our interests, manage our agents, and attend to collections. This position involves no canvassing and is a bona fide weekly salaried position, with all expenses paid, to the right party. It is mainly office work conducted at your own home, with an occasional trip out among the agents. No investment required. Also three salaried vacancies in the traveling department. Enclose references and self-addressed stamped envelope to PROVIDENCE CO., 149 Caxton Bldg., CHICAGO.

LADIES I Make Big Wages —AT HOME— and will gladly tell you all about my work. It's very pleasant and will easily pay $18 weekly. This is no deception. I want no money and will gladly send full particulars to all sending 2c. stamp. MRS. A. H. WIGGINS, Box 8, Benton Harbor, Mich.

NO EXPERIENCE NECESSARY. NO CAPITAL REQUIRED. We furnish a full line of samples, stationery, etc., and tailors-to-the-trade complete outfit ready for business. NO COMMISSION PLAN. You regulate your profits to suit yourself. NO HOUSE TO HOUSE CANVASS. This is not one of the many catchy advertisements for agents, but one of the very few advertisements offering a rare opportunity to secure a strictly HIGH GRADE EMPLOYMENT at BIG WAGES.

WE ARE THE WORLD'S LARGEST TAILORS. We buy our cloth direct from the LARGEST AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN MILLS. We control the entire output of several of these mills. We own our materials at the lowest possible cost, and operate the most extensive and economic tailoring plant in existence, and cut to measure and make to order Suits and Overcoats from $5.00 to $15.00 (mostly $5.00 to $10.00). Pants from $1.50 to $5.00. Fancy Vests from $2.00 up. The days of ready-made clothing are numbered. AT THESE PRICES everyone will prefer to have his garments cut to his measure and made to his order. NO DIFFICULTY IN GETTING ORDERS.

OUR PLAN. If your references are satisfactory we start you out at once. We furnish you FREE a complete AGENT'S SAMPLE BOOK AND OUTFIT. Our large, handsome, leather bound Sample Book contains our entire line of Suitings, Overcoatings, Trouserings and Vestings; full instructions for taking measurements (which you can learn in 5 minutes from the large photographic illustrations in the book), colored lithographed fashion plates, full description of the material underneath each sample, and prices left blank for you to fill in, fixing your profit to suit yourself. This Sample Book is put up in a Fine Canvas Carrying Case, which also contains Tape Measure, Order Blanks, Business Cards, Stationery, Advertising Matter and Agents' Guide and Instruction Book, with Net Confidential Price List, also complete "Salesman's Talk." Our instructions are so plain, our suggestions to the salesman so thorough, that anyone can immediately make a success of the work. YOU REQUIRE NOTHING. Just take the orders and send them to us; we make the garments promptly and send them by express, C. O. D. subject to examination, and if not perfectly satisfactory they can be returned to us at our expense. Neither the agent nor his customer assume the slightest risk. WE TAKE ALL THE CHANCES OF THE TRANSACTION. We either ship direct to your customers, collecting your full selling price and send you weekly check for all your profit; or, if you prefer, we ship direct to you at your net confidential price, allowing you to make your own collections.

YOU CAN ADD A LIBERAL PROFIT TO YOUR CONFIDENTIAL PRICE.

NEARLY ALL OUR MEN MAKE $40.00 EVERY WEEK IN THE YEAR.

THE OUTFIT IS ABSOLUTELY FREE. We make no charge for our complete Agent's Sample Book and Outfit, but in order to protect ourselves against many who might impose on us by sending for the outfit (which costs us between $5.00 and $6.00), with no intention of working, but merely out of idle curiosity, we require each applicant to cut this ad out and mail to us, giving the names of at least two parties as reference, and further agree to pay a temporary deposit of One Dollar and express charges for the outfit when received, if found exactly as represented and really a big money maker. While this nominal deposit of $1.00 for the outfit is not one-fifth of its cost it insures the good faith of applicants, and we promptly refund your $1.00 as soon as your sales amount to $25.00, which amount you can take the first day out.

IF YOU WISH TO MAKE $5.00 TO $20.00 EVERY DAY cut this notice out and mail to us at once, giving us the names of two or more men as reference. Address, RHEUMATISM IS DEAD!

Long Live OXIEN, the King of Remedies that Killed it.

No more infernal tortures, no more roastings of the flesh with red hot irons, no more lightning shocks from the electric battery or dosings with dangerous drugs.

RHEUMATISM HAS BEEN CONQUERED by Oxien the triumph of medicine, the Godsend of the age. Absolute cures are now certain, and Oxien is making them every day. In this connection

WE HAVE A WORD TO SAY.

Oxien was last year put to the test as a remedy for Rheumatism and it made a record of absolute cures in Acute Rheumatism, frequently called rheumatic fever, Pericarditis (inflammation of the investing membrane of the heart), Endocarditis (inflammation of the living membrane of the heart), subacute rheumatism, sometimes applied to the less severe attacks of the disease, chronic rheumatism, which swells and twists the joints and sciatica, or neuralgia of the sciatic nerve. In fact Oxien is guaranteed to cure Rheumatism in any form. Thousands jump for joy and many write as follows:

Received OXIEN O. K. Found it far superior to what you represent. Have tried everything I could hear of for rheumatism. For ten years I have been crippled up with this terrible disease. Laid in bed one whole year. Could not turn or feed myself and when I was able to walk on crutches (which I did for four years) was crooked and unable to straighten up, but Oxien did it and you can imagine how happy I am now. Yours sincerely, Geo. F. Lawton, Olympia, Wash., Feby. 9th, 1898.

FREE 200,000 BOXES OF RHEUMATISM CURE. FREE. This momentous offer we make in order to more thoroughly introduce this amazing rheumatism remedy in the United States and Canada. None but those who will give us their word that they either suffer from rheumatism, or are afraid of it through hereditary tendencies will be considered entitled to free treatment. Therefore, if you want a box free send at once, yes to-day. Write plainly as our clerks are badly rushed.

THE GIANT OXIE CO., Box 1120, Augusta, Maine.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

AS A MAN AND A MASON.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE majority of historical works affirm that George Washington was born on February 22d, 1732, but in the old family Bible the entry of his birth reads "George Washington, son to Augustine and Mary his wife, was born on ye 11th day of February 1732, about ten in the morning and was baptized the 3d of April following. Mr Beverly Whiting and Captain Christopher Brooks, godfathers and Mrs. Mildred Gregory godmother."

This date, as given in the old Bible being in accordance with the calendars then used and equivalent to February 22d, of our later ones.

Washington and his family always observed the 11th as his birthday until his twentieth year, and the first known public celebration of his birth was on February 11th, 1784.

Washington secured a fair education and fitted himself for surveyor, following that line of work for several years, three of which were spent in the employ of Lord Fairfax. During the last year of these three his brother died, leaving the estate of Mount Vernon to his daughter with the provision that if she died without issue, it should then go to his brother George Washington.

The daughter died in 1752, and having no children Washington came into possession of the place which is to-day sacred ground because it was his home, and is his last resting place.

Washington became a Mason before he attained his majority, as shown by the old records of the Fredericksburg Lodge, which record his presence there on Nov. 4, 1752, which is probably the date of his initiation. The records show, also, that four months elapsed before he became a "Fellow Craft" Mason and eight months before he became a "Master Mason."

The Bible on which Washington was obligated is a small quarto volume, bearing the inscription "Cambridge, printed by John Field, printer to the Universalist, 1668," and is preserved with the seal and the old records of the Lodge.

In 1759, Washington was married to Martha Dandridge Custis, widow of Col. Daniel Parke Custis, who brought with her a son and daughter, to whom Washington took the place of a loving and loved father.

The daughter died just before the opening of the Revolutionary War, but the son, John Parke Custis, served as one of Washington's aides-de-camp until he died from the effects of a fever contracted at Yorktown.

After the death of his step-son, Washington at once adopted his two children, George Washington Parke Custis and Nelly Custis, and these are the children who have been called "The children of Mount Vernon"—Washington's only by adoption.

The ceremony which made George Washington the first President of the United States was performed in New York City on April 30th, 1789, when he was fifty-seven years of age.

Robert R. Livingston, Chancellor of the State of New York and Grand Master of its Grand Lodge of Masons administered the oath of office, using the Bible which belonged to the St. John's Lodge of Masons in the city. Gen. Jacob Morton who was Marshal of the day was also Master of St. John's Lodge and brought the Bible from the altar of the Lodge room for use in the ceremony.

The leaf on which Washington pressed his lips was at once folded over, and very soon after the Lodge caused a complete history of the event and a picture of Washington to be engraved on the cover, and the Bible is still in the possession of St. John's Lodge No. 1.

Washington died on Dec. 14th, 1799, and the funeral services were held at noon on Dec. 18th, Rev. Dr. Davis who was Rector of Washington's church (The Episcopal church of Alexandria) and also a member of the Lodge to which he belonged (No. 22 of Alexandria) conducting them, assisted by the Lodge.

Public Memorial services were held in New York on Dec. 31st, to express the sorrow of the people. The Masonic Fraternity were out in full force, and once more the Bible which Washington was sworn into office on was brought from its place in the Lodge room and carried, just before the Grand Master, in the procession.

Some Masonic Lodges of Boston held private Memorial services while others joined in the public ceremonies, but the Grand Lodge of that jurisdiction waited until the 11th of the following February and then held special services followed by public ceremonies.

At the time of Washington's death the Grand Lodge of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, sent their message of sympathy to Mrs. Washington, at the same time asking tor a lock of his hair, to be placed in a Golden Urn, and preserved with the jewels of the society. The request was granted and when the ceremonies of February 11th were being carried out, the Urn containing the lock of hair was carried in the procession by six distinguished Masons, after which it was placed in the keeping of the Grand Lodge.

Many relics are held by the various Lodges of the country in memory of Washington, but aside from those already named, one of the most valuable is the apron sent to him by the wife of Gen. LaFayette in 1784.

Madame LaFayette made the apron of white silk and embroidered the masonic emblems on it with colored silks. The apron was placed in a valuable rose-wood box, also ornamented with masonic emblems, and delivered to Washington by Gen. LaFayette when he came to America. For a long time this apron was kept at Mount Vernon but was finally presented, by Washington's heirs, to the Washington Benevolent Society, and by them given to the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, in whose possession it remains, while the box in which it was sent is treasured among the possessions of Alexandria Lodge.

Two years before Washington received the apron from Madame LaFayette he had been presented with one by Watson and Cassoul, worked in gold and silver tinsels and showing the French and American flags. From the fact that this apron is kept with the LaFayette box in the possession of Alexandria Lodge, many people make the mistake of supposing it to be the apron which came in the box.

Mention should be made of one other relic, which is of national interest in a double sense. On September 18th, 1793, Washington assisted in laying the south-east corner stone of the Capitol building in Washington, and the ivory gavel which he used on that occasion is preserved by Lodge No. 9 of Georgetown, which was one of the Lodges taking part in the ceremonies.

A MAGIC FLUTE ROMANCE.

John Henderson is the luckiest man in the West. If you don't believe it ask him and he will confess it, and tell you moreover that he owes all his good luck in this life to the Magic Flute. It is a strange story, but the true facts are these: Mr. Henderson was in love. The object of his affections was a beautiful young girl of his native town, Des Moines. She was a musical enthusiast and had suitors by the score, for she was not only charming and beautiful of face and figure, but to these graces she added the talent of a superb musician. Naturally, though Mr. Henderson pressed his suit with great ardor, as he was not a performer on any musical instrument he failed to make the desired impression, however much he loved music, and dearly loved the object of his affections.

Happening in Omaha one day, quite disconsolate, he was astonished to hear sweet and tender strains issuing from the rear door of what proved to be a music store. He paused at the curbstone and listened. It was one of the favorite songs of his beloved, and so mellow and sweet were the sounds that they brought tears to his eyes. Entering the store the stranger asked what sort of an instrument it was that gave forth such magic sounds. He was shown the Magic Flute which had just arrived from New York. Thinking that the instrument that performed such tone miracles must have cost a hundred dollars or more, he was amazed to see what a trifling sum. He bought the instrument, and the next day returned to his native city and that night under the window of the maiden who had rejected him for his lack of musical abilities, Mr. Henderson poured forth his soul in the songs she loved so well. What was the result? The neglected lover was reinstated in the affections of the fair one, the rival suitors retired beaten in the game, and shortly after he was offered a large nightly sum by a celebrated impressario to appear in concert halls of the leading cities of the United States. Mr. and Mrs. Henderson, completely happy and full of gratitude for the workings of the Magic Flute, are at present traveling in the East, playing to large houses, Mrs. Henderson accompanying her husband on the piano. The musical world is amazed and delighted with the performances of Mr. Henderson on the Magic Flute. And yet his case is merely typical. You may not win a lovely bride by your skill on the wonderful instrument, but one thing you can do, even if you do not know one note from another, you can play a tune in five minutes and should delight your friends with it within a week.

We have made arrangements with the manufacturers to introduce these wonderful Flutes, and will send one free, all charges paid, including a trial yearly subscription to all sending 25c. to COMFORT Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine. Agents are selling large quantities of these Flutes and you better not delay in sending for a sample and getting wholesale prices.

$1,000 FOR A CERTAIN OLD COIN.

WHILE there are some people who have a vague idea that coins issued 100 or 1000 years ago are worth fabulous sums, yet very few know that coins issued only a few years ago are at a large premium. For instance, the silver dollars of 1895 and many of the earlier ones. The first Columbian half-dollar, issued 1892, sold for $1,000. All the half-dollars from 1879 to 1890 are at a premium, also Isabella quarters of 1893, the old issue of the quarters and half-dollars of 1853, twenty-cent pieces 1876 to 1878; five and three-cent pieces of 1877; last issue of the two-cent copper and three-cent silver pieces; first issue of the nickel cents, all gold dollars and three-dollar gold pieces; all Territorial and California coins from 1849 to 1880, and thousands of earlier American and Foreign coins, Canadian especially. There is also a premium on some coins with MINT MARKS O, S, C, D or CC; also on fractional currency, colonial, continental and Confederate bills and old POSTAGE STAMPS. THE GLOBE reports that a coin was found in Galveston worth $5,000. THE NEW YORK JOURNAL says that a cent was plowed up at Aurora, N. Y., worth $1,200, and that Mr. Castle paid $4,400 FOR A STAMP found at Louisville, Ky. THE WORLD says: "Many people have become wealthy by looking after old coins and stamps." THE HOME JOURNAL says: "Coin and stamp collecting is a profitable business, as there are but few in it. The Numismatic Bank buys from Agents all over the country, and pays them big sums." Coins that are very hard to find in one section are often easily found in others. A Boston baker sold 116 coppers for $6,915, 29 silver coins for $4,715, and 4 gold coins for $1,700, and others have done nearly as well. MR. F. W. AYER sold recently a lot of stamps, collected since 1892, to Stanley Gibbons for $250,000. THE COMMERCIAL AND FINANCIAL NEWS says: "The Numismatic Bank is not only the largest institution of its kind, but as reliable, safe and trustworthy to deal with as any National Bank. The enormous business done by them is the result of SQUARE DEALING and liberality." Send two stamps for our illustrated circular on rare coins and stamps, which may prove to be your stepping stone to wealth and independence. NUMISMATIC BANK, (Dept. C, Boston, Mass.

"THAT NOBLE ANIMAL, THE HORSE." YOU WANT IT.

THE GREATEST and BEST BOOK EVER WRITTEN on HORSES.

A Gold Mine of Interest and Information by Which You Save Dollars.

Prof. Oscar Gleason, the greatest horse owner, trainer and breaker that ever lived in America has at last consented to write a book on the Horse. We have made arrangement to furnish copies of this valuable work to all lovers of horses, and we call your attention to the great value of this unparalleled work which should be in every home and stable in the land. Gleason's Horse Book is a large handsomely bound book of over 400 pages, printed on pure white paper in large, clear type, bound in colored covers and richly and elegantly illustrated with 186 full plates and illustrations drawn by special artists. It is the most complete horse book ever published, produced under the direction of the United States Government Veterinary Surgeon. In this book Prof. Gleason has given to the world for the first time his wonderful methods of training and treating horses. It contains chapters on History, Education, Teaching Tricks, How to Buy, Feeding, Breeding, Breaking and Taming, How to Detect Unsoundness, Care, Complete Instructions in Proper Horse shoeing and one Invaluable Study of the Diseases and Treatment of the animal. This part alone is worth many times the value of the book and will save horse owners hundreds of dollars every year. It is a colossal compendium of facts every person ought to know who is in any way interested in horses. Nothing left out. Clear, Concise and Captivating. Order one to-day and you will never regret it; it is a whole Library on Horses in itself. Gleason's Horse Book is found in the libraries of the wealthy and has always been sold as high as $3.00 a volume until now.

SEE HOW TO GET IT. To introduce our monthly paper into homes where an interest is taken in horses we will send a copy of Prof. Gleason's Horse Book, described above, to every person who will send thirty-three cents to pay all shipping charges and for a trial six months' subscription to our paper. Great Club Premium. If you will get up a club of only two yearly subscribers to this paper at the special trial subscription price of 25 cents each we will send you the book as a free premium.

How Uncle Sam Once Became the Beneficiary of Fate.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT

MANY of the officers who came over from Europe to seek commissions in the Revolutionary army were men of high character and noble lineage who had displayed redoubtable courage, attained military rank and gained extensive practical experience in European wars before they came to America and espoused the cause of the struggling Colonists. Notable among these were General LaFayette, a marquis of the wealthy French nobility, who had risen to the rank of captain of dragoons in the French army and was fired with the spirit of personal sacrifice upon hearing of our struggle for freedom; Frederick W. A. Steuben, a Prussian baron, who had attained the rank of Adjutant-general in the Prussian army, especially distinguished himself in the battle of Prague and Rossbach, held the commission of Adjutant-general on the King's staff, and (after the seven years' war) had been the grand marshall and general of the Prince of Hohenzollern-Hechingen's guard and had, in that capacity, accompanied the Prince himself to many of the courts of Europe; Casimir Pulaski, a Polish count, who had acquired military experience in the service of Duke Charles of Courland, had fought for the liberty of his own unhappy country and had resisted its spoliation and division until further resistance became hopeless and he had been declared an outlaw under the coalition which had been formed by Austria, Russia and Prussia for the conquest and division of Poland; and Thaddeus Rosciuszko, another Polish patriot of noble lineage, who had been educated in the military academy at Warsaw and the military school at Versailles and had afterwards risen to rank of captain in the army of Poland. But there were many others of less note before they came, of less prominence after they arrived, of less force to the glorious struggle in which they engaged, and of less consequence in the history of the stirring times in which they figured; but they were all imbued with the spirit of liberty; they all made heroic sacrifices in espousing its seemingly hopeless struggle against superior forces; they were all associated with more or less adventurous undertakings of romantic chivalry, and they all deserve alike to live forever in American song and story, to be held up for the veneration of each generation of American progeny.

Some of these officers were recruited upon European soil by our agents, or supposed agents, there, and came to the Colonies under special contracts which specified what rank they should hold and what compensation they should receive; but Congress was not always able to meet the financial obligations thus imposed. The difficulties were not only numerous and grave, but they were almost insuperable. Congress was unable to pay the officers during the contest and it encountered great difficulty in obtaining even money enough to send the soldiers to their respective homes, or places of enlistment, when the war finally closed; it was absolutely unable to pay the army in full—much less the officers. Some idea of the extent of this difficulty may be formed from the fact that, although the foreign continent fared rather better, on the whole, than did the home volunteers, an especial effort having been made to pay them as nearly as possible all that was due them; yet, when the first general account of the total debt of the United States was stated, on the first day of January, 1790, there was found to be an indebtedness of $198,208.10, principal and interest, still due the foreign officers who had served in our army. But this great sum represented the principal and accrued interest of what was left of the total indebtedness, on this account, when the whole thing was assumed by the present form of our National Government; it did not necessarily represent the whole amount of obligations, in money, which the war left due to foreign officers, for some of that might have been paid by the several Colonies, or States, on their own accounts, and some of it might have been paid, under the Articles of Confederation, by the United States, for all that the records show. But that sum was still outstanding and unpaid when the present Constitution was adopted, when Washington became President and when the whole thing was assumed and paid by the United States. This sum simply represented the foreign officer-element in the general legacy of debt which the young Republic inherited from the struggles attending its birth. But it shows that our obligations on that account must have been considerable in the aggregate. At any rate, one of the officers who came over under a contract specifically naming the rank and compensation which should accompany his commission in the army was Maitre du Coudray. The contract which he presented was signed by Beaumarchais as the agent, in France, of the United Colonies; and it stipulated that du Coudray should be a general of artillery and receive the emoluments and perquisites of that rank. But, when he arrived and presented his contract, it was next to impossible for the authorities to honor its terms and recognize the binding force of the agreement.

General Knox (one of Washington's best generals and most trusted officers, as well as his first Secretary of War after he became President), was in command of the artillery, and Washington was unwilling to have him superceded by any one, much less by a raw recruit, ignorant of our country, language and people; for it would have been detrimental to the prosperity of the army and it would have worked a discourtesy, if not an indignity, upon a worthy and most capable officer. As Washington was opposed to having Gen. Knox displaced, and there was no other way of honoring the terms of the contract, the matter was referred to Congress for adjudication. But Congress, not knowing just how to get out of the embarrassment, adopted a course of dilly-dally and delay by putting the final settlement of the question off, from time to time, in the hope that something might happen to render its settlement less difficult. Pending decisive action, however, du Coudray consented to occupy a subordinate rank until his exact status could be authoritatively determined. There is no telling what might have been the ultimate outcome of the apparent conflict between a delicate sense of national courtesy and honorable duty, on the one hand, and the practical dictates of exigency and expediency on the other, if an unforeseen accident had not come to Uncle Sam's rescue. But Fate contrived, just at this critical juncture, to relieve the gravity of the situation and open up a way out of its embarrassment; for, while the long dreaded and long deferred final adjustment of the embarrassing complication was being thus held in abeyance by an amicable arrangement effected through the courtesy of Maitre de Coudray himself, and while Congress was utterly at sea as to how it was ever going to do even and exact justice to all of the equities involved, without making some sacrifice which the Colonies could ill afford at that time, Maitre du Coudray was accidently drowned while crossing the Schuylkill river.

THE MAGICAL SPONGE.
THE WONDER OF THE 20th CENTURY.
For Polishing and Cleaning Windows, Signs, Mirrors, Show Cases, Gold, Silver, Nickel, also Jewelry, Copper, Brass and Tin.
For the Bath IT HAS NO EQUAL.

A Labor-Saving device entirely new and universal in demand. Will last a lifetime and costs but Twenty-five cents. Just on the market and over 500 Gross sold last month. Every family in the land wants one or more. All you do to sell them is simply show the lady of the house or the office man how it works on his window and you will depart with one less every time, but in its place a quarter.

The Magical Sponge differs from the ordinary sponge in nature, while the common sponge is of vegetable origin and found in the ocean, the Magical Sponge is a mineral production and found in the United States, dug from the ground, carefully prepared and manufactured into sponges for the Housekeeper, Merchant, Liveryman, Metal Workers, and all persons who desire to keep their homes, offices, and business places in a clean and healthy condition.

No Soap or water is needed or even used with the Magical Sponge for Cleaning Windows or any outside Metal. In the winter time it has no equal, it does not freeze, and no water being used (other than what is in the sponge) all trouble and hard work is avoided. For Cleaning Baseboards, Window Sills, Wainscoating and painted surfaces, it acts like a charm; takes all the finger marks, spots, grease and dirt away, leaving a Clean, Polished Surface.

Good men wanted all over the country to handle these goods, big inducements offered steady workers, and exclusive sale. To Agents, Salesmen, and house to house canvassers, who send us 25 cents for a 6 months' subscription, we will send one sample post paid, and make them a business proposition. Write at once. Secure your territory.

THE VAN NESS MANSION.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

WHEN, in 1791, the location of the city of Washington was finally decided upon, and the plans of the future capital of our nation were drawn up by Major Charles Pierre L'Enfant, the ground which it was destined to occupy was mainly owned by four men, Daniel Carroll, Notley Young, David Burns and Samuel Davidson. Of these four the only one with whom our narrative has to deal is David or Davie Burns, an obstinate, contumacious old Scotchman who lived in a tiny house containing two rooms and a garret, and which, until quite recently, stood a little to the southwest of the White House and the Corcoran Art Gallery.

At the time when negotiations were commenced with Burns for the sale of a part of his land for the use of the future city, he was a poor man, owning little except his plantation. This comprised about six hundred acres and extended as far as the Patent Office and where the National Postoffice now stands. Although the plans for the city had been carefully made, so that neither his house nor the land immediately surrounding it should be disturbed, Burns was exceedingly unwilling to part with his land, and grudged every acre claimed by the commissioners, notwithstanding the fact that he was well paid for it all.

Finally Washington wished to purchase from him, for a public reservation, the ground now known as Lafayette Park; but to all his persuasions and arguments Davie turned a deaf ear. At length, losing patience, Washington exclaimed:

"Had not the Federal city been laid out here you would have died a poor tobacco planter."

"Aye, mon," retorted Burns, "an' had you not married the widow Custis, wi' her nagurs, you would hae been a land surveyor to-day, an' a mighty poor ane at that."

It is said that Washington, at this reply, completely lost his temper and quitted the house, and would never again meet the old Scotchman; but ultimately the obstinate old man gave way to the pleadings of the commissioners, and the coveted piece of land was secured to the city.

David Burns' estate came to him through a long Scotch ancestry, and we can hardly blame him for being unwilling to relinquish his patrimonial acres. He had been married, and had, at this time, one little daughter, Marcia, who was the delight of his life. His wife had died when Marcia was very young, and he immediately took advantage of his newly acquired wealth to give his darling the best education which the times would allow. For himself, he never altered his simple style of living, but remained to the end of his days in the rudely fashioned cottage where the new city found him. But Marcia was sent to Baltimore, into a cultivated family, where she remained several years. When she returned to Washington, a most beautiful young lady, she at once became the belle of society, and the rude little cot became the haunt of the most desirable young men in the city. Dashing young Members of Congress, gay fortune hunters, gallants of every kind, picked their way across the marshes to sue for the favor of the young heiress, but her father would have none of them, and they were promptly dismissed by him with cutting words.

But at length General John P. Van Ness, Member of Congress from New York, young, popular and handsome, won his way into the citadel of the old Scotchman's heart, and married his daughter. David Burns died not long after the marriage, leaving all his vast wealth to his only child, who still continued to make her home in the old cottage. At last, when their only child, a daughter, was about returning home from the school in Philadelphia where she had been educated, General Van Ness and his wife thought it time to have a better home to hold so fair a jewel as their daughter, and accordingly built the magnificent mansion which is still known as "The Van Ness House," and which in those early days was regarded as a marvel of richness and elegance. With its wonderful carvings, its sculptured mantels of Italian marble, its finish of costly woods, its doors covered with Spanish ornamentation, and its handsome furnishings, it was the admiration of all; while its lavish hospitality and its magnificent entertainments caused it to be known far and near. Standing, as it does, at the foot of Seventeenth Street, it commands an extended view far up and down the river and across into Virginia; Alexandria and Georgetown, then both large and prosperous cities, were in full view, while the Potomac which flowed past, directly in front of the grounds, was alive with shipping going to or from these two ports.

For a time the inhabitants of this beautiful dwelling were happy in the possession of wealth, popularity and of each other. But the daughter soon married a young man from South Carolina named Arthur Middleton; and in one little year from that time she lay dead with her tiny baby on her breast. Then came to Marcia Van Ness sad days. No longer did she care for society, for mirth or for gaiety, but spent her time in doing good to others. She did not, as so many have done in similar times of trial, nurse her grief selfishly; but, instead, she lavished her love, her time and her wealth on the orphaned children of the city, and the Washington Orphan Asylum stands to-day, a living witness to the devotion of this bereaved mother to the unfortunate little ones deprived of a mother's care. Her father's old cottage had always been preserved by her, and now it became her haven of rest, where she went for help and comfort when her loss pressed heavily upon her, and where no eye but that of her Heavenly Father, whose aid she sought, ever intruded upon her meditations.

But at last, when she had only rounded out half a century of usefulness, the death angel came to bear her above, and after a long illness, and much suffering patiently borne, she departed to join her dear ones.

Her husband erected a magnificent mausoleum to her memory, fashioned after the pattern of the Temple of Vesta, and costing $34,000 and in it he placed her remains and those of her father and mother. It was then located in an enclosure on H. Street near Ninth Street, and close to the Orphan Asylum which she had founded and endowed; but as the city grew the space which it occupied was needed for buildings, and the mausoleum was removed to Oak Grove Cemetery, Georgetown, where it still stands, one of the wonders of that beautiful "City of the Dead."

General Van Ness lived to be seventy-five years old. He entertained royally, and every year Congress was his guest. After his death the property passed into the hands of heirs who divided it amicably among themselves. The cottage has disappeared through decay and neglect, and the beautiful old mansion is fast following it through the same causes. For several years the place was used as a beer garden; then it was rented to colored people, and bore a most unsavory reputation; and now the house and grounds are owned by an athletic association, and the public are rigidly excluded from the grounds. The house is no longer used or kept in repair, and will soon be a thing of the past. "Sic transit gloria mundi."

TALKS WITH GIRLS.

CONDUCTED BY COUSIN MARION.

Well, cousins, how have you passed the first month of the new year? Does 1900 seem to you to be very much different from the other years you have known? I imagine not, but I hope before the year is over that each and every one of you will have found it the best year of your lives and that it will be so because you have used your best endeavors to make it so. It is that, dear cousins, which makes the years better, and you must remember it always in everything you do. Now, let us see what you have to talk to me about.

The first is "Doubtful" of Belle Plains, Iowa, and she wants to know what to do with a young man who calls regularly awhile and then irregularly, and never says when he will come again or whether he will ever come again. The answer is easy. That kind of a young man is to be treated with indifference and every now and then when he calls, the young lady should have an engagement with some other young man. And most of all stop giving him a thought; he isn't worth it.

Inquisitive Nelly, Battle Creek, Mich.—(1) You may or not invite your escort in when he brings you home, provided it is not after ten o'clock. (2) You can get a book on the subject at any bookstore. (3) Genius will show itself before the age of fifteen. Go right on doing the best you can and if you have genius of any kind everybody will know it.

Beulah, Rhinelander, Wis.—The simpler the subject you have for your class essay, the better, and anything you know the most about will do. In writing a Class Prophecy make it as ridiculous as possible by getting it as far from the truth as possible.

Verletta Van, Boise, Idaho.—Yes, it is an insult to a lady for a man to attempt any familiarity with her. (2) Love is not to be won; it comes freely or not at all.

Mary M., Sioux Falls, S. D.—There is no cure for a nose that gets red when it gets cold, except to keep it warm. Did you ever see a nose that wouldn't get red when it is cold? Aren't you worried over nothing?

I. B. C., Watsonville, Cal.—It is difficult to find work to do at home that will pay. Thousands are trying to find it and only a very few succeed. Don't pay money for anything till you know what you are going to get.

Goldcake, Freeport, Ill.—Do not use hair dye to change the color the Lord gave your hair. (2) No cure. (3) No, a youth of sixteen who doesn't know his multiplication table has no business going to see a girl of twenty-three—unless she is his school teacher and he wants to learn arithmetic.

Rosy Lee, Glenview, Ky.—Your question is unanswerable as there are no data on the subject.

O. and B., Washington, D. C.—Better be friendly with the family of the young man to whom you are engaged. (2) Address the letter to the person and the company and regiment and send it to the War Dep't. Washington. (3) The young man may do as he pleases about giving you his photograph. Make him return yours. (4) No, all red headed people are not deceitful—that is, not more deceitful than the other kind. (5) See answer above to "Doubtful". (6) You may go driving during the day with a man.

Sweet Sixteen, St. Joseph, Mo.—Girls of sixteen have not arrived at the "beau" age and that makes all the things you ask about improper. Talk these things over with your Sunday School teacher.

N. B. C., Campbellsburg, Ky.—Actresses do not wear masks to make themselves beautiful. They paint, that is all. (2) Advertise your parlor organ in the local newspaper.

Dora, Wilkes Barre, Pa.—The lady may take her own time to answer a note from a man, whether it comes by messenger or not. Ordinarily she should answer as promptly as possible. The man pays for the messenger, unless he is called by the lady.

Tommy and Nell, Villa Grove, Ill.—(1 and 2) No. (3) Young ladies should not answer advertisements for correspondence. (4) Don't marry the jealous and selfish man if there is any other man to marry—and there always is. (5) I think railroad men, "especially baggage masters," are about as trustworthy as the average man. (6) Sometimes the marriage of a Protestant and a Catholic is very happy, but it is risky. (7) If she is engaged to him she may kiss him good by. Not otherwise. (8) Of course, tell your friend, man or woman, all about the new frocks you have got. (9) A lady may send a gentleman flowers, but it is usually the other way. (10) Nobody exactly knows why a fast young man is more attractive than the slow kind, but he always is—more's the pity. (11) Stay in church till the services are over. (12) A young man who will go from Virginia to Illinois to see his sweetheart must have serious intentions. Hasn't he popped the question yet? (13) Ask your mother why you should not send the kodak picture you mention. (14) You may meet the young man in the city if you have a chaperone. (15) Don't flirt with your sweetheart. It is dishonorable and dishonest.

Rose Bud, Boyd, Texas—Truly, dear cousin, with so susceptible a heart as yours I do not see how you can avoid being in trouble. Suppose you marry the young man in the show business and travel with him. That will keep your mind off of yourself.

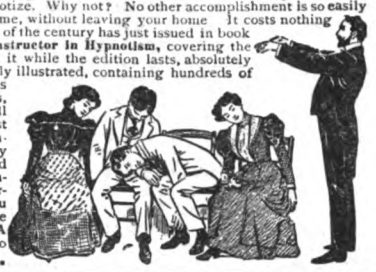
Phyllis, Baltimore County, Md.—A year is plenty long enough for an engagement.

H. and S., Roann, Ind.—Snub the youth that is too stupid to talk. (2) Have as little as possible to do with people who make engagements and do not keep them. It is only another form of lying.

Violet, Augusta, Va.—Ask the young man for the lock of hair. (2) Paper is not an edible, therefore do not eat it. It is made of cord word, old rags and other things not found on the table. (3) Don't wave at the trainmen. (4) You can wear any colors if you don't have any of them too pronounced.

Gervaiss, Harpster, Idaho.—You should lead the way into your own house. (2) Begin eating at a hotel when your order comes, if you want it hot. (3) Your escort leads the way in a hotel dining room, and you put your gloves in your pocket if you want to. (4) Ask the lady's permission before introducing a man. (5) Congratulations are in order immediately after the ceremony if the wedding occurs in the house, and the bridesmaid leads.

Lampasas, Texas—Miss Helen Gould is a brunette, about the average height, between twenty-five and thirty, and she lives in New York City.



Now, dears, all your questions are answered, and I will say by by till the cold winds of March come, but don't let the chill ever get into your warm, young hearts and make your world a cheerless place.

AAAADDEFGGIIIILNNOORR

HISTORY PUZZLE We will give $2000.00 in gold to anyone who will arrange the twenty-one (21) letters printed above into the names of three well known states of the United States. This is an instructive and interesting problem of history. One of these three states was settled by the Spanish in 1564, first became a territory March 3, 1822, and then a state March 3, 1845. Another of these three states was settled by the French, 1730, became a territory May 7, 1800, and a state Dec. 11, 1816. The other one of these three states was settled by the English in 1733, and was one of the original states. Each one of these three states have the same number of letters in it, and each also ends with the letter "A." Remember we do not want one cent of your money. There is only one condition which will take less than one hour of your time, and that is that you shall sell eight subscriptions at twenty-five cents each to one of the oldest and best known Boston magazines which has been established over twenty-two years. Your friends will thank you as they will each save twenty-five cents by trading with you. In making the three names the letters can only be used as many times as they appear. After you have found the three correct names, you will have used every letter in the twenty-one exactly as many times as it appears. The money will be paid March 20, 1900. Should more than one person succeed in finding the three correct names the money will be equally divided. We make this liberal offer in order to introduce one of the most charming and interesting family magazines fully illustrated with art colored covers into every family and home where it is now unknown. Try and win! If you will make the three correct names and send them to us at once, who knows but that you will win the prize? Anyway we do not want any money from you and a contest like this is very interesting. As soon as we receive your solution, if it is correct, we will mail you at once the eight coupons. You will know your solution is correct if you receive the coupons. We sincerely hope you will as we shall surely give the $2000.00 away anyway. Do not delay. Write at once.

A PENCIL THAT WILL THINK FOR YOU.

LIGHTNING CALCULATING PENCIL.

By a Twist of the Wrist this Little Wonder Solves all Mathematical Problems as Quick as a Wink.

The Great Profit Maker of the Century.

All Problems Solved. Short Cut to Results. A Quick Sum Total. No Mistakes Possible With Sunshine's Calculating Pencil.

Here is the only reliable never-failing standby. It is the neatest educational novelty of the day. This pencil is a marvel of ingenious mechanism, and a great profit maker for agents.

You will hardly believe that this pencil can figure quicker and more accurately than you can. It will calculate anything from 1x13 to 12x24 in the twinkle of an eye. It gives you 144 combinations and is absolutely correct. It can't make mistakes. It is made of pure Aluminum and attached to a Faber Pencil. Fits any ordinary pencil. It has a good eraser. It protects your pencil point. It is a pencil lengthener and stays in your pocket.

Let Sunshine's Calculating Pencil do your figuring and give your head a rest. A sleepy man will get more accurate results with its aid than a wide awake calculator could get without it. Simple and solidly made. Interesting and instructive to everyone. You can't think half as quickly and accurately as this pencil does it for you. Teaches children more in one hour than they learn in a week in any other way. Simple as a clothespin to manipulate, a child can learn to work it in five minutes, it never blunders, is easy to see through. Tell your friends and teachers about this wonderful device, it's the greatest educational novelty out. Interests dull pupils as well as bright ones. Creates enthusiasm in mental calculation and helps in the most difficult subject with which both teacher and pupil have to deal. We send full directions with each pencil so you can get it ready to work as quick and easy as you open a jackknife. You can multiply quicker than an expert, a lightning calculator. Get one to-day.

The Educational Value of this Arithmetical Pencil is based on the highest Multiplication Table it contains. Every person should know it. Yet many never learn it. They are thus hindered in acquiring quickness and accuracy in mental calculations so necessary to business success. It is especially recommended to young people starting in business life and to those with neglected education. Teachers recommend it to their pupils because the use of the pencil imparts a knowledge of these figures in ⅓ of the time required by the usual methods. Even the Indian office of the U. S. government has recognized its educational merits and recommended that the superintendents of all Indian schools be supplied with samples.

SPECIAL OFFER. These Calculating Pencils sell for 25c. each, but we are anxious to show you how wonderful they are so will send one free to all who enclose 15c. for a six months' subscription to SUNSHINE, the great monthly, two pencils and a year's subscription for only 25c. Thousands are sold by agents. We send six pencils for 60c., twelve for one dollar, all charges paid by us. One hundred for $7.50, express not paid.

Searching for Sufferers

YOU MAY NOT FEEL SICK

BUT ALL HANDS POINT TO THE FACT YOU ARE NOT WELL AND WHETHER YOU BE MAN OR WOMAN YOU WILL SOON TAKE ON THIS AGONIZED LOOK.

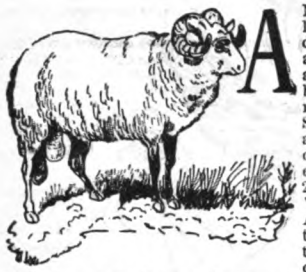
WE CAN HELP YOU.

YOU DON'T NEED MEDICINE.

But you say you feel generally miserable or suffer with a thousand and one indescribable bad feelings, both mental and physical? Among them low spirits, nervousness, weariness, lifelessness, weakness, dizziness 'feelings of fullness or bloating after eating, or sense of "goneness" or emptiness of stomach in morning, flesh soft and lacking firmness, headache, blurring of eyesight, specks floating before the eyes, nervous irritability, poor memory, chilliness, alternating with hot flushes, lassitude, throbbing, gurgling, or rumbling sensations in bowels, with heat and nipping pains occasionally, palpitation of heart, short breath on exertion, slow circulation of blood. Don't your hands and feet become cold and clammy, do you HAWK AND SPIT and expectorate greenish colored matter? IS your urine scanty or high colored and does it deposit a sediment after standing? You have pain and oppression in chest and back, pain around the loins, aching and weariness of the lower limbs, drowsiness after meals, but nervous wakefulness at night, languor in the morning and a constant feeling of dread as if something awful was about to happen.

There Is Help for You. You Can Yet Be Happy.

I have an appliance. The only way to introduce it is to let you try it FREE. You will tell others if it helps you. It is perfectly harmless. Send us your name we are looking for real sufferers and knowing it will do you good you can cure yourself without trouble or expense. This article is perfectly safe and reliable, can be worn day and night, all of the time or part of the time and in any place or spot on the body that feels sick or shows pain—it is most marvelous acting and is the greatest God-send you ever heard of. After you use it and you feel its power you will say $25 would not have prevented me from sending for it. It acts just as well on man or woman.



THE ONLY CONDITIONS.

We send one all charges paid. It is Medical and we are obliged to put on Revenue stamps. Therefore as we furnish them entirely free we simply ask you to send us TEN CENTS for mailing, etc. We trust to your honor to tell others about the cure and know many will be sold thereby. We do not ask you to send any more money unless you want others to sell at a profit after you try it. Address,

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

ANOTHER Astrological Year has dropped into the abyss of the past and Mother Earth begins a new journey around the Sun this year at about half-past 8 o'clock in the evening of the 20th day of March, Washington Time. At that moment the last degrees of the celestial sign of the BALANCE will ascend with Scorpio occupying the most of the ascending house. Venus and Mars, rulers of the ascending signs, are, therefore, taken as joint rulers of the scheme erected for the time. Those two planets are benevolently beholding each other and mutually assisting each other for good. The Moon, co-significator of the people of the country, is in the ascendant and has the good rays of Mars a joint ruler. Venus, ruler of the sign ascending, angular and powerful in her own sign, presignifies general prosperity, health and gladness of the people and a fruitful condition of the earth.

JUPITER, the GREAT BENEFIC, is dignified and in the House of the Nation's treasure giving additional testimony of the financial prosperity of the government, marked increase of public revenues and general good fortune in a financial sense. True, Mars bears somewhat unfavorably upon Jupiter, which indicates some heavy expenditures for war purposes, some pronounced antagonists among the people against consolidations of capital in the shape of trusts, and the probable loss of some government property, ship, or buildings by fire or violence of the elements.

Mercury retrograde and having the square of Saturn indicates some unusual agitation in Congress on questions involving the Postal service of the nation and the public revenue from the same. Scientific and literary men meet with some unusual difficulties and the obituary of the Spring Quarter will contain the names of some quite eminent men in science and literature. One highly learned in the law and another high in church councils goes to "that bourne from whence no traveler returns." Some serious cases of dishonesty among postal employees are unearthed and the Postal service loses some one among its highest officers. The money market is in a rather feverish state and fluctuations of stocks are likely to be quick, especially near the time of this ingress and along about the 8th, 14th, and 17th of April. Mars in the 5th house, cautions those in charge of theaters and places of amusement as well as seaside resorts and hotels to have unusual care that fire is not allowed to prove disastrous. It is apprehended that the fire losses for the quarter will be somewhat in excess of the average.

Saturn dignified and in north Latitude is said to signify that the air for the quarter will be temperate and healthy. Jupiter in Sagittarius is said to presignify a temperate air in the beginning of winter but unusual cold at the end of winter. We may, therefore, look for colder ranges of temperature in the first days of March with abundant downfall of rain and snow, as Mars is at the quarter round in Pisces.

Lung and liver troubles are to be particularly guarded against during this spring quarter also quite a prevalence of affections to the head and eyes. In these respects our Chief Executive is invited to have more than usual care.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR MARCH, 1900.

MARCH. 1—Thursday. The early hours are not chosen for any important work; but as the day advances let best attention be given to all classes of literary engagements, matters of account and record, mail and newspaper work, correspondence, mathematical and scientific labors, and travel; be sure not to use the early forenoon for applications.

2—Friday. Begin this day early on the lines laid down for the preceding day and crowd all efforts until 4 o'clock in the afternoon for furthering all engagements with the pen and with persons in the literary pursuits; let the forenoon be fully employed for all commercial transactions of consequence, but urge all matters early as they are likely to drag or be fruitless if continued far into afternoon; the latter half of the day is adverse for successful issue of dealings concerned with houses and lands when also it will be wise to avoid dealing with thy landlord and to suspend negotiations as to such commodities as coal, iron, petroleum, wood, lumber and grain.

3—Saturday. Urge general business vigorously during the forenoon, when have dealings with persons of prominence or wealth not concerned in public office; seek money accommodations, buy goods conservatively for trade, especially in the nature of woolens, silks, and clothing generally; hold the temper as the noon hours are passed.

4—Sunday. A favorable Sabbath day, encouraging lofty sentiment and elevating religious discourse; the later hours incline to recreation and amusement rather than sober contemplation.

5—Monday. Use this day for making applications for favor or advantage from public authorities, large corporate bodies, associations and organizations and from all persons in authority over thee; postpone correspondence for the evening and be very chary of initiating any literary venture of consequence during the next 24 hours; the intellectual classes will be adversely disturbed and matters of contract, account, and correspondence will seem to drag in a peculiar manner; be cautious what writings are signed and see that no deceit is practiced upon thee for a season.

6—Tuesday. Indifferent in the forenoon, but as the day advances let all honorable undertakings be urged to the utmost; when also let all routine matters of contract, commercial and financial be conducted, and correspondence and travel be done as the afternoon progresses.

7—Wednesday. Look sharp here or the purse will suffer serious depletions or losses; speculation is peculiarly hazardous, as values are likely to be suddenly changeable and flighty; these suggestions are peculiarly appropriate for persons born about the 1st of March, June and September, of past years; as conditions are conducive to serious shrinkages of property values in those lives and they are cautioned also to conserve the health as regards the liver and lungs; caution is likewise intended for this month to such persons in regard to losses from fire and explosion and there are likely to be some very destructive conflagrations involving extraordinary property losses; let all have care in handling combustibles and explosives; a marked antagonism seems to be engendered between mechanics and organized capital and this day contributes to its development; ecclesiastical affairs suffer detriment during these middle days of March and religious denominations meet adverse experiences; beware of entering upon any new venture at this time, especially if one that is outside of thy regular and legitimate avocation.

8—Thursday. Diligently improve the benefic influences which prevail on this day for all the elegant pursuits; in artistic and musical matters conditions favor happy progress and REGULUS advises his friends to crowd such engagements to the utmost; landscape work and the animal painting have very helpful influences; more than usual pleasure will be had from the social, musical or dramatical entertainment of the evening.

9—Friday. The forenoon is peculiarly unpropitious and bids thee postpone important writings and correspondence and all the major commercial enterprises until the afternoon hours; have no transactions pertaining to real estate; embarrassments and unusual annoyances are likely to come to editors, authors, booksellers, publishers, printers, mathematicians, surveyors, lawyers, and judges; especially if born about the 24th of March, 26th of June, or 24th of September or December, of past years; the afternoon is best for the pursuit of the ingenious and mechanical trades and for dealings with glassworkers, iron and brass founders, bakers, butchers, and the manufacturing classes.

10—Saturday. Urge general business on this day; seek favor from public officials and persons in authority in thy business associations.

11—Sunday. Not a favorable Sabbath day, especially for appreciation or enjoyment of the elegant in literature or art.

12—Monday. A day of excellent promise, inviting travel, business activity, and enterprise; have transactions relating to patents and trade-marks, also with banking institutions, trust companies, public treasurers and the financial officers of large corporations; buy goods to sell again and generally urge all important undertakings.

13—Tuesday. Sign no writings pertaining to mining matters nor have any transaction in houses or lands or agricultural products during the forenoon; the afternoon should have the preference for all dealings of consequence.

14—Wednesday. Give attention during the forenoon hours to matters concerned with real estate and its improvement or decoration; deal in house furnishings and urge the elegant occupations and polite arts; the landscape painter, architect, and horticulturalist are peculiarly favored here and dealers in drugs, tinctures, wines and cordials should use this forenoon for effecting their principal engagements; the dramatist and musician are also encouraged to be active in their enterprises during the early hours; the latter part of the day is peculiarly mischievous for financial matters, indicating losses from haste or impetuosity or through the fiery or destructive elements; let all have care as the night advances that no opportunity is allowed for fires from carelessness; combustion will be very ready during these middle days of the month and probably more than usually mischievous during the night hours between the 14th and 15th. Some unusual discord in church circles is indicated hereabouts and those in charge of church buildings should be particularly on the alert against loss from fire. The time is peculiarly evil in a financial sense for persons born about the 1st of March, June and September, of past years, and the majority of such persons are in danger of bad losses in business or embarrassing circumstances hinder best progress in the enterprises in which they are engaged; such persons should avoid speculation nor should they precipitate litigation in their affairs.

15—Thursday. Do not court or marry on this day nor should much progress be looked for in any of the elegant pursuits; social and musical entertainments are not favored for the evening.

16—Friday. The day is peculiarly evil for the inauguration of any matter of importance; avoid having any transaction pertaining to real estate and keep out of mines, wells, and all underground places and away from tottering walls and insecure scaffolding, especially if born about the 3rd of March, 2d of June, 5th of September or 6th of December, of past years; and those so born should have care of their persons if compelled to be about machinery, unruly animals, or where explosives are stored and should have best care of health as there is danger of serious trouble with lungs and liver.

17—Saturday. After the morning hours planetary conditions are much more promising than usual and encourage the vigorous prosecution of all honorable undertakings; buy goods for trade, adjust accounts, make collections and have financial transactions of consequence; do not, however, use the early forenoon for any of the important moves in the literary world.

18—Sunday. The mind is much concerned with religious matters and discourses will be earnest and eloquent; the evening is more contentious and out of harmony.

19—Monday. This day encourages dealings with the laboring classes and promotes advantage from transactions with plumbers, tinners, and building contractors; seek favor from thy landlord in the forenoon; do not use the evening for any social entertainment nor for important efforts in musical or dramatical undertakings.

20—Tuesday. Begin this day early and urge business with dealers in hardware, cutlery, firearms, metals, glassware, brass and iron work and chemical and electrical materials and apparatus and also with persons engaged in the ingenious and mechanical trades; the afternoon is not to be depended upon for good.

21—Wednesday. Have dealings on this day with public officers or the managing authorities or superintendents in great corporations or upon large public works; urge correspondence and literary matters generally; sign writings of all kinds; engage servants, travel, remove, and have engagements pertaining to finances and dealings with persons of wealth.

22—Thursday. Use the early hours for financial negotiations and for making collections; but have care as the noon is approached not to permit haste or precipitancy to mar the measure of thy success; in the afternoon and evening avoid all rashness of word or act and be not easily moved to wrath; the day is peculiarly dangerous for surgical operations and it is, at the same time, strangely conducive to classes of accidents such as require the aid of surgery; let all have care against permitting excitement to run away with temper or judgment.

23—Friday. The middle hours are the best in this day, in which the best efforts in business should be expended; but as the afternoon is passing there begins a range of adverse influences covering about 36 hours in which little encouragement is had for any very important moves in life. The latter part of this day is unpromising for the gentle sex and warns those who are matrimonially inclined to shun such engagements if their desire be for peace and happiness in the married state; scrutinize very carefully all business enterprises offering themselves in the latter part of the day and first half of the next; for no matter how flattering the promises, the outcome threatens to be very unfortunate; this is peculiarly true for persons claiming this as the anniversary of their birthday or who were born about the 26th of June, 23rd of September, or 27th of December, of past years.

24—Saturday. Strange occurrences will seem to baffle thine efforts during the early hours of this day, nor shouldst thou be disappointed if success does not crown thine efforts in any direction; sign no writings, do no correspondence, make no bargains concerning houses or lands nor make any attempt to gain favor or advantage from thy superior; do not be deceived by appearances nor representations in purchase of goods but satisfy thyself carefully that no hidden defects exist; purchases of goods for trade are much better deferred for a season.

25—Sunday. A day in which the musical portion of religious worship will be unusually happy and effective, though the afternoon is to be less commended than the early part of the day.

26—Monday. Begin this day with the sun and improve every moment; the merchant, tradesman, commercial traveler, and all engaged in literary pursuits or having employment concerning books are particularly favored. Let all classes of contracts affecting legal matters and money transactions and all important movements for intellectual improvement and educational interests be now made. Give preference to the afternoon for dealings with bankers, judges, and persons of wealth or prominence.

27—Tuesday. Undertake nothing of importance in the forenoon of this day, particularly in either the literary or artistic pursuits, when also defer thy purchases of wearing apparel until a more favorable time; the afternoon is more promising.

28—Wednesday. The first half of this day encourages association with the aged and the active pursuit of all general business, but preferences may be given to dealings in real estate, boots and shoes, dyes, wool, lead, coal, lumber and all classes of building materials; beware of any speculative deal in the afternoon when losses and financial set-backs are more likely to be the rule of the time; watch thine expenditures and live within thy means.

29—Thursday. An unpromising forenoon, cautioning avoidance of disputes and domestic infelicities, especially in nativities susceptible in this respect; seek no favor from railroad officials nor from persons high in public office; urge correspondence and the adjustment of literary matters in the afternoon.

30—Friday. The conditions of this forenoon do not encourage dealings with the laboring classes or with persons following trades dirty in their nature or that are concerned with the improvement of lands or mining properties; as the noon is passed, however, let every energy be put forth to forward all thine honorable undertakings; have money negotiations and open new places of business, also seek favor from persons in authority.

31—Saturday. The first half of the day is the best and should be fully improved; the afternoon is less promising.

"MADE ME A MAN."

Thousands of Rescued Sufferers from Lost Manhood unite in Praise of CALTHOS.

An Offer Every Sufferer Will Be Sure to Accept.

NO C. O. D. OR DEPOSIT SCHEME.

Read carefully this announcement made by one of the greatest and richest importing firms in the United States. Heed the wise words written here, and accept the generous offer made you. You have the opportunity to be restored once more to robust health and happiness. Accept it now. Do not put it off until it is too late. Since the introduction in this country of CALTHOS, the great French preparation for Lost Manhood, the Von Mohl Company, of Cincinnati, O., has achieved marvelous results. More than 100,000 cures have been made the past year.

Before Prof. Jules Laborde, the famous French Specialist, brought his discovery, CALTHOS, to the knowledge of the world, the best physicians denied that any medicine known to science could restore the vital forces of men, if once lost through overwork, abuse, or excesses. CALTHOS is the greatest sensation in the medical world today. The cures made by CALTHOS (many of the cases of years standing) have attracted the attention of medical men everywhere. The National Medical Board has recommended the remedy for use in Insane Asylums, where, as well known, a majority of the male inmates are victims of lost manhood in its most terrible form, brought on by abuses and youthful error. In Europe the remedy is endorsed by the French and German governments, and is used as a specific in the great standing armies of those countries, and generally in all the famous Sanitariums and Retreats of the Old World.

FREE 5 days' trial treatment

The Von Mohl Company has decided that every man in America who is suffering from Lost Manhood, shall have the opportunity to try out this wonderful remedy CALTHOS in his own individual case. For that purpose they have recently imported 100,000 special 5-day treatments, to give away as a trial, free of any charge whatever. If you suffer from Lost Manhood, Varicocele, Weakness of any nature in the Sexual Organs or nerves, (no matter how caused), or if the parts are undeveloped or have shrunken or wasted away, CALTHOS, will cure and restore you.

CALTHOS is put before you on its merits alone. Put it to the test, try it free. There is no security required. No C. O. D. or Deposit scheme.

Send us your name and address, and The Von Mohl Co. will send you enough "CALTHOS" to last five days. IT WILL BE SENT IN A SEALED PACKAGE BY MAIL. In the quiet of your home you can try it and see what it does.

All correspondence relating to the "CALTHOS" department of our business is strictly confidential. We neither publish nor furnish testimonials. Address applications for trial treatment to

A Complete Outfit of 44 Tools FREE.

GREATEST MONEY MAKER AND MONEY SAVER EVER SEEN: NEEDED IN EVERY HOUSE IN THE WORLD.

Hundreds of dollars are wasted every year in paying for repairs which could be done by you just as well as by the person you hire. "Yes," you will say, "I could do this work if I only had the tools." You have to hire the plumber or cobbler and pay him for his time while you stand around and look on, watching him do the work which you could do as well as he, but it is always that you have no tools. We have put together the best kit of tools for repairing which was ever seen, and we will sell the entire outfit for less than half the money for which you could buy it at any store. The outfit consists of forty-four first-class tools, as shown in the above cut, viz: 1 iron last for men's work; 1 iron last for boy's work; 1 iron last for women's work; 1 iron last for children's work; 1 iron stand for lasts; 1 shoehammer; 1 shoeknife; 1 peg awl handle; 1 peg awl; 1 wrench for peg awl handle; 1 sewing awl handle; 1 sewing awl; 1 stabbing awl handle; 1 stabbing awl; 1 bottle leather cement; 1 bottle rubber cement; 1 bunch bristles; 1 ball shoe thread; 1 ball shoe wax; 1 pkg. clinch nails, 4-8 in.; 1 pkg clinch nails 5-8 in.; 1 pkg. clinch nails, 6-8 in.; 1 pkg. heel nails; 4 prs. heel plates, assorted sizes; 6 harness needles; 1 harness and saw clamp; 1 box slotted rivets, assorted sizes; 1 rivet set for same; 1 harness and belt punch; 1 soldering iron, ready for use; 1 handle for same; 1 bar solder; 1 bar resin; 1 bottle soldering fluid; 1 copy directions for halfsoling, etc., 1 copy directions for soldering all securely packed, together with directions for use, in a neat case. These tools bought at a hardware store separately would cost between $7.00 and $9.00. You can repair boots and shoes, tap and heel them, mend your harness or make a new one, mend all kinds of tinware, repair pumps, plumbing and similar work, and do all kinds of leather work about carriages, etc., as well as repair and mend rubber boots, rubbers, overshoes, and all kinds of rubber made articles. The clamp is used for mending harnesses and filing saws. Has a coil spring and is made of iron. You can easily save five times the cost of this outfit in six months and make a heap of money doing little repairs for your neighbors and others. "A stitch in time saves nine," and if you have these tools in your house you can make repairs and save a great deal of money which you would pay if you let a break go or hired a man to do your repairing work for you. Every one of these tools are full sized, practical, neat and cheap. It is the only complete outfit in the market and thousands have been sold in past years for $3.00 when the outfit contained but about half as many smaller articles to people living in the country and small towns as well as in the city. This repairing outfit, weighing 20 lbs. will be sent by freight complete as above described for only $1.62 which includes a 6 months' trial subscription to this paper.

GREAT PREMIUM OFFER.—If you will get up a club of 6 yearly trial subscribers to this paper at the special price of 25 cents each, we will send you one of these repairing outfits as a present to you.

COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

CURRENT TOPICS IN AMERICAN HISTORY.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HEAVY were the hearts of all Americans when it was announced in the press dispatches that General Henry Lawton had fallen, shot by a rifleman in the thicket, while he was inspecting the firing line on his advance into the rebellious provinces in Luzon. Conspicuously attired in a yellow rain coat and white helmet, he was a mark for every sharpshooter; but no remonstrances were sufficiently strong to cause him to take any precautions for his own safety, and he seemed not to know the meaning of the word fear.

Thus while leading an expedition, every day of which was attended with great success, he was shot and instantly killed. His body was brought back to Manila, where his family were and carried with military honors to a returning American transport for transmission to America. In General Lawton's death the country has lost one of her most gallant and conspicuous soldiers. His career has been a notable one and he has won distinction for bravery and merit in three wars. Our readers will remember that this department contained a condensed sketch of his services and a portrait only a short time ago. The initial cut at the commencement of this article is from a photograph taken just as he was entering his last campaign.

A pleasant characteristic of the American people has been shown by his death. It became generally known immediately after that his family would be left in comparatively destitute circumstances and a movement spontaneously shaped itself in many parts of the country to give them material relief. The Secretary of War, Mr. Root, organized the forces and within a few days subscriptions to the amount of $50,000 which was the desired sum, had flowed into the proper depositories for the fund.

The American people are wonderfully charitable. Other people expect governmental reward, but it is characteristic of our countrymen to give subscriptions of money individually. Only a short time ago Sergeant "Bill" Anthony, the marine who reported the disaster to Capt. Sigsbee when the Maine was blown up in Havana harbor, became discouraged and suicided in one of the parks of New York City. It became known to the public immediately after that his family was without means of support, and at once the generous-souled Americans subscribed enough money to decently bury him and to comfortably support the family which he had left behind.

Immediately after Gen. Lawton's tragic death, Hon. John Barrett, formerly minister to Siam, at a dinner given by the New England Society in New York on December 22d read a letter from him written in November, saying that should he be shot down by a Filipino bullet it would really be the work of the American sympathizers, as the war would have been over months ago but for the sympathy a few Americans had extended the insurgents. This letter has caused a profound sensation. There have been several attempts to have the question considered by Congress.

ALL SOULS' CHURCH.

Meanwhile the war in the Philippines has degenerated into a pursuit of bands of guerillas. The successes are all on our side, but under the conditions there can be no great victories, or even battles. Aguinaldo is still fleeing, though almost all of his relatives are captives. A plot was laid for an uprising in Manila but it failed to materialize. It is probable that the war may last some time or its collapse may come at any time. Guerilla fighting is always an uncertain matter in time.

COMFORT recently reported the departure of Archbishop Chapelle, the papal delegate to the Philippines. It will be remembered that almost all the Filipinos are devout Roman Catholics and the government hopes for much assistance from the Archbishop in settling disturbing questions in the archipelago. He arrived in Manila January 2nd on the transport Sherman. The various brotherhoods of friars, which have held such immense influence in the islands are much disturbed as to the future and everything is being done to influence him and Father McKinnon, who accompanied him, either for or against the friars. Inasmuch as the question of the expulsion of the friars from the islands and the freedom of the people from the orders has always been declared to be the principal cause of the revolt of the natives against Spain's sovereignty, longtime residents of the islands declare if the priests are returned to their former parishes, the natives seeing them return under American administration, will surely attack and kill them and otherwise cause continued disorder.

While there is intense interest and much curiosity as to the intentions of the Roman church in the islands, it is a matter of interest to know that in America much will be done to send missionaries out to the natives by the Protestant denominations. Naturally the Catholics have never allowed religious toleration in the islands, and for the first time another branch of Christian belief gains a foothold among the natives. The first step is to be the building of All Souls' church in Manila.

The Rev. John Krachen Pearce is to be the pastor, and the church is to be undenominational, unsectarian and is intended as a welcome home for any Christian. The pastor is to pay for the completed edifice from his private funds and it is estimated to cost $150,000 when completed. The slate roof is from Bangor, Me. and interior furnishings from Boston, but the steel frame and stone are to be prepared in the islands. After the church is completed Dr. Pearce will build a club house for Athletics.

England has declared flour a contraband of war and her warships have seized several cargoes in American and German ships, evidently on their way to the Transvaal republic. This action being unprecedented in war has occasioned much comment in diplomatic circles. The flour being American has caused our Government to properly protest. Germany has done so in a yet more forcible way and it looks as if international complications might arise over this British construction of International law. It is not likely, however, that this country will do anything to embarrass England in the struggle going on in South Africa, although the Continental powers would like to intervene if possible, and especially if such intervention would humiliate Great Britain.

Just after our own Civil war a Fenian brotherhood of Irishmen prepared to invade Canada. There was a strong feeling between the countries at the time, growing out of England's attitude during the great struggle between the states. Apparently there was to be a great army cross the border and drills were known to be going on. Soldiers were prepared on both sides of the line; but in the end the invasion failed to materialize and became a joke for all. Recently, for a few mornings, the press teemed with dispatches promising a similar invasion; but so little attention was paid that the subject fell flat. It is supposed this was inspired to frighten Canadian authorities from sending any more soldiers to the Boer war.

The magnanimity of the American government has again been most strikingly illustrated by its decision relative to the repatriation of Spaniards which was made public during the holidays. In the treaty of peace the United States agreed to procure the release of Spanish prisoners in the Philippines and to return them home. Various terms were employed in the different parts of the agreement to designate the classes of persons entitled to a free passage from the Philippines; thus they are spoken of as "Spanish soldiers," "Spanish prisoners," "prisoners in the hands of the insurgents," etc. The decision is of the broadest character and allows not only actual soldier prisoners but also every Spaniard, who by the exigencies of war was compelled to remain within the insurgent lines, this great privilege. While the number is far greater than the signatories contemplated, the American people will willingly pay the bill, believing that the effects of such generosity will go far towards healing the scars of war.

Much has been said and written of our policy in China and of the attitude we should take in our dealings with other nations interested in the Far East. The negotiations opened by Secretary Hay with the great powers of Europe and with the Japanese Empire relative to a common understanding of what is called the open door policy throughout China, seem to have met with unqualified success. As it is the intention of the President to make the question the subject of a special message to Congress, it is not possible to obtain full particulars at the present time, but enough has been given out to the public for all to know that Great Britain, Russia, France, Germany and Japan have all answered favorably to the American suggestion. Only one country, Italy, failed to respond but it is believed she will do as the others have indicated. Should this plan be carried out all countries would have equal rights in trade in China, no matter what other country actually possessed the port.

Among the very notable events of last month was the dining of 20,000 people at a Christmas feast in Madison Square Garden by the Salvation Army of New York City. Besides this great feast over five thousand basket dinners were sent to poor families. Such deeds show how alive the real spirit of Christianity is among our people to-day.

The condition of American interests in Cuba remains about the same. Major-General Brooke, who has been governor of the island since its evacuation by the Spanish, has been recalled, and it is said will be placed in command of one of the western departments in this country. He has been an efficient governor, but some of his acts have been severely criticised and it is stated that his recall was decidedly unpleasant to him. The President has appointed General Leonard Wood, who has so successfully governed at Santiago, as provisional governor of Cuba. To do this it was necessary to appoint him major-general in the army which was done immediately on the assembling of Congress. It is believed that General Wood has the entire confidence of the Cubans, and the progressive methods and tact which he has displayed in the subordinate position at Santiago give full promise of a distinguished career in regenerating Havana and Cuba.

MAJOR-GENERAL BROOKE.

Among the sadder bits of news for the month has been the breaking down in health of Hon. Chas. A. Boutelle, representative in Congress from the 4th Maine district. Suffering from a complication of diseases, his mind has been somewhat clouded and it has been necessary to withdraw him from public life and place him in a sanitarium for treatment. He has had a very distinguished career in public life, and has been noted as a stalwart fighter on the floors of Congress. He has served for nearly twenty years, and at the present time is on several of the most important committees, being chairman of the committee on naval affairs which practically has control of the American Navy. His illness is remarkable from the fact that the Maine delegation in Congress served together for many years, and by their long service commanded a strength possessed by not even such large states as New York and Pennsylvania. Two years ago, one member, Mr. Milliken, died. This was followed by the death of Nelson Dingley, one of the most distinguished statesmen of his time, representing the second district; and immediately after, Hon. Thomas B. Reed, Speaker of the last House of Representatives, withdrew from public life, resigning his seat in Congress. If the present illness of Capt. Boutelle should entirely incapacitate him, the entire Maine delegation in the lower house will have changed within two years. This delegation has often been held up to the public to show how much the system of keeping trained men who prove faithful in Congress would accomplish; and, as above suggested, notwithstanding the small number of representatives, their training, ability and coherence have given them a strength in the nation entirely disproportionate to their numbers or the state they represented.

It is a notable thing that this Maine system of reward for good services has trained Maine men into being among the greatest statesmen in America; and only two years ago the Speaker of the House of Representatives, which is the second most important office in the country, the Chief Justice of the United States, and the Vice President pro tem. of the Senate, were all Maine men. In one of the sessions of Congress, during the '70s, when Mr. Blaine was Speaker of the House of Representatives, out of a membership of approximately three hundred men, over ten per cent. of the members of the House were born in the state of Maine, a fact which Mr. Blaine said was so remarkable that its equal was not presented in American history.

THE INSANE PHOTOGRAPHS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY MINNIE W. WILLIAMS.

Copyright, 1900, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

"GOOD morning, Uncle Ben. I have succeeded at last. You know I told you that there is a kind of light in the sunshine that we can't see, and——"

"Good morning, Richard. I have succeeded at last, myself. You know I told you if you didn't stop spending money and get to work I would disown you. I made up my mind last night, and day after tomorrow Addlesby will be up to alter my will. I give you till then to get your traps out of the house. As sure as your name is Richard Hovey you'll get to work then."

The younger man drew back a little as he understood that the threat he had often heard but never believed in had at last materialized. His face hardened and he nodded sharply and turned on his heel. At first his steps led toward the house, but under the influence of an idea he turned out of the front gate, walked rapidly down the street and entered a cosy-looking house on the door of which appeared a small sign, Albert Barlow, M. D.

The doctor was in his office, and after an exchange of courtesies with his visitor, which proved them well acquainted if not friends, Hovey made known the object of his errand.

"What are the requirements of the law regarding incarceration for insanity?" he asked, dropping almost immediately into business.

"Certificate of two reputable physicians," replied the M. D. "Why? Who is it?"

"My uncle."

"You don't say!"

"Isn't a trial necessary?"

"They have a hearing before the probate judge, of course, and the court must be convinced. Most weight is given the opinion of the physicians, though. What are your uncle's symptoms?"

"What would you say of a man who took a walk in the bright sunshine without a stitch of clothing on him, and an open umbrella without a cover carried carefully over his head?"

"That he was insane without a doubt. Has your uncle done that?"

"Would you have to see it to believe it, or would photographs convince you?"

"I don't know about the photographs. I would have to see them first."

"I will see you again, Doctor,—perhaps this evening."

"Won't you give me any more of the details?"

"Everything, next time I see you, Doctor. Good day!"

Hovey walked back to his uncle's house briskly, and an evil light shone in his eyes, which yet also shone with some trace of humor. The uncle had other reasons for disinheriting his nephew beyond those given. He would not work—in the sense of seeking employment—because he thought there was no necessity for it when "the old man" had so much superfluous wealth. The real grievance was that he had fallen into evil ways, and was associated with a loose set of men whose gambling bouts were the least of their vices.

Yet despite his failings, Richard Hovey was a genius, and much of his time was spent in a disused part of the house which he had fitted up as a workshop. Thither he now repaired, and a few minutes later might have been seen, coat off and sleeves rolled up working in the light of a ruby lantern. A large camera lay on a table and from this he extracted a peculiar looking opaque lens which he inserted in an ordinary portable magazine camera. Then from a large sheet of cardboard painted with some glistening substance he cut a square and placed it in position in front of the lens.

"No," he said, communing with himself, "it had better go behind the lens, inside the camera, and out of the sunlight," and he suited the action to the word. Finally he removed the roll of film and replaced it with another which had been lying in a bell-jar under the action of some gas.

A park abutted on the block of houses of which Benjamin Hovey's was one, and in this park it was Mr. Hovey's habit to promenade twice a day. He was now stalking slowly along, his portly figure bent forward, and a worried frown on his face. Over one shoulder he bore a large silk umbrella, and in the free hand a cubical leather covered box, done in red Morocco leather, and bound with parallel strips of Russia iron. The box contained his private papers which he had been examining in the park.

Behind the fringe of shrubbery he might have seen his ingenious nephew tip-toeing along with his camera, taking snap shots at every favorable opportunity. As he used the last end of film he chuckled to himself: "That leather box couldn't be better. It will look like a bird cage."

The dinner hour passed. Mr. Hovey wondered if his nephew would have the effrontery to come to dinner, and hoped he would not. There was no danger of it; safe in his dark room the inventor was developing his pictures, and as they flashed up he uttered shrieks of delight. To look over his shoulder one would have seen view after view of a portly gentleman clad in nothing but a long flowing beard, walking with ponderous step along the driveway. In the background were the fountain, grottoes, and the brick summer house, which served to identify the locality. Over his shoulder the nude figure carried an umbrella with ribs extended, but without a vestige of cover. From two fingers of one hand, suspended by its ring, hung a square object which looked just as the inventor had predicted, like a bird cage.

Several of these pictures young Mr. Hovey rejected, muttering once, "That would give the whole snap away." These he left on a shelf just over the sink, while he proceeded to print and mount the ones that he had chosen as best suited to his purpose. With a half dozen of these he hurried down to Dr. Barlow's, and finding the physician still at home, displayed them and asked if they were enough to satisfy him of the elder Hovey's insanity.

Barlow examined the pictures with great interest and admitted unhesitatingly that there could be no doubt of the case. Yes, he would be willing to sign a certificate, and would appear before the probate judge if necessary—indeed would be glad to, as insane cases were always interesting.

Elated at his first success, the plotter sought out a second neighboring physician named Cole. Dr. Cole exhibited great interest in the pictures, but he began to ask awkward questions. "You say these were taken in the early morning?" he inquired suspiciously, examining the shadows with care. Hovey repeated his assertion that it was early morning, before any one was astir in the park.

"He's carrying his watch and chain—and that looks like a bunch of keys just over his hip; see, they are visible in every picture!"

Hovey simulated great surprise, but explained the presence of these articles by supposing that his uncle, actuated by an insane freak, had tied them in place with string which they could not see. Dr. Cole dropped his head into his hand and began to think. He was something of a scientific experimenter besides being a successful physician, and some strange ideas began to flit through his brain.

The other broke in impatiently. "Well, are you willing to certify to his insanity?" he demanded.

"I have not yet seen the patient," answered the doctor.

"And you won't certify without seeing him? Well, sir, in that case I will not trouble you further. Good day," and Hovey gathered his curious photographs and took his departure.

"What do you think of that?" Dr. Cole asked himself as the door closed. "If I didn't know you, Mr. Hovey, I would think it very unusual. But since I do know of you and your ways, and your relations with your uncle, suspicion reaches well nigh to a certainty. I think I understand your little photographs, and while I don't sympathize with your game, I must admit that you have made a wonderful scientific discovery. I wonder if I can't get some evidence to checkmate the schemer."

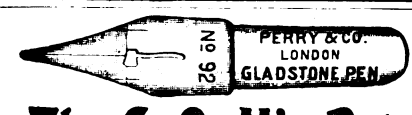
Richard Hovey was by this time well on his way in search of another physician. This time he experienced no trouble, and armed with the two certificates hurried to the court house. As it chanced he arrived after the hour of adjournment.

About midnight a man might have been seen to steal through the gloom across the grounds surrounding the Hovey mansion. He tried several of the windows in that part of the house where the workshop lay. One of these opened to his touch and he climbed in. His first act was to find the dark-room and light the ruby lantern, and the glow on his face showed him to be Dr. Cole. Immediately before him lay the negatives from which the pictures had been printed and these he examined in detail. Next he found the camera with its curious lens and screen, and these he studied with many repressed exclamations of wonder and admiration. Finally, continuing the search, he found the rejected negatives. Success at last! Hovey had rejected all his pictures that contained any other figures besides his uncle, and for the very good reason that these other figures were all naked too. Every picture that the doctor held up to the light contained besides the nude image of the elder Hovey, one or more persons in an equally insane state of undress!

The doctor slipped the negatives into a pocket and hurriedly escaped by the window through which he had made his burglarious entrance.

Mid-morning of the next day an officer, armed with an order to bring in the body of Benjamin Hovey, visited the residence and presented him, handcuffed as became a raving maniac, before the probate judge. The old gentleman was paralyzed with wonder and rage, but amazement was complete when his nephew, stating himself to be the nearest relative, requested the court to adjudge him insane and commit him to an asylum for treatment and safe-keeping. The certificate of the physicians was presented. The court asked for more specific evidence. Young Mr. Hovey told how his uncle was in the habit of parading about, clothesless and with the bare ribs of an umbrella outspread, and exhibited the photographs in corroboration.

The old gentleman sat through it all without saying a word, but there certainly was an insane look on his face. The veins on his forehead swelled instant by instant, and the red hue of his face changed to purple.



Just then the younger Hovey uttered a wild curse. A new comer had entered the court room. It was Dr. Cole, and in his hand he carried a number of photographs. "Your honor," he said, "I wish to be sworn as a witness. * * * In order to make myself clear I will have to explain that the X-rays are not obtained alone by electrical means, but that the sunshine itself contains these rays and other forms of radiation differing only slightly from them. Mr. Richard Hovey, nephew of the defendant, has made a momentous scientific discovery. He has discovered a means of screening or sifting the sunlight so as to select any kind of light he may want. With a camera arranged to take up the light which passes through all dry organic matter—like wool, cotton, silk and leather—he took numerous photographs of his uncle during a recent noon-day walk in the park. In support of this assertion I will exhibit some of the photographs which I have here. He has shown only those in which his uncle appeared. I will show those in which his uncle and other promenaders appeared, all equally bereft of clothing!" As he finished speaking, the doctor passed up the photographs.

There was a cry and young Hovey made a rush to capture the pictures. An officer caught him and jerked him back. Then he turned on his uncle. "What right have you to be, I want to know! Didn't I invent you? What right have you to was—to were—what right to has been? Ha—ha—ha! Everything spins and I spin—was spinning—will was be—ha—ha—ha!"

The elder Hovey had forgotten his unutterable rage and looked at his raving nephew in fright. Of the two doctors who had signed the certificate, one leaned over and tapped the other on the shoulder. "We made a mistake in the first name of the patient," he said; "we will have to change it."

SAVED BY DEATH.

A TRUE STORY.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY F. E. BURNHAM.

Copyright, 1900, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

THE CANNON Ball Express rolled into the terminal station on schedule time at midnight, December 22, 1887, the fireman with his hand on the throttle, George Hastings, the engineer, missing.

John Brant, the fireman, was in a state bordering on nervous collapse when he stumbled out of the engine, and being unable to talk coherently, the conductor of the train came forward and told what he knew of the remarkable disappearance of the engineer a hundred miles out.

"We were running ahead of time," said the conductor, "passing a milestone every sixty seconds. Suddenly the air-brakes were applied and the engine reversed, and in less than thirty seconds the train had come to a stop. Brant was in much the state that he is now.

"'George has fallen out of the engine,' said he, when I came up to the engine.

"We all took our lanterns and went back over the road and searched for fifteen minutes, but there was not a trace of Hastings to be found. If the earth had opened and swallowed him, he could not have disappeared more completely."

Weeks passed and nothing was heard or seen of the missing engineer. It was suggested that he had received an injury to his brain and that he had wandered away, unable to bring himself in touch with the world. Others, however, advanced the thought that the fireman knew more of the engineer's disappearance than he chose to tell. The police were of this opinion and a detective was put on the scent.

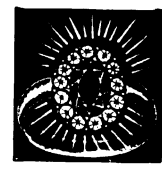
Detective Sargeant was the man assigned to the case and it was not long before he had learned much of John Brant's history, and the more he learned of it the greater was his bewilderment. Up to the moment that the engineer and fireman stepped into the cab that memorable night in December, the two men were apparently the best of friends. What reason was there for supposing that Brant had laid violent hands upon the engineer? And holding that he had done so, what opportunity had the fireman to make away with the engineer's body?

Fried Onions.

Indirectly Caused the Death of the World's Greatest General.

It is a matter of history that Napoleon was a gourmand, an inordinate lover of the good things of the table, and history further records that his favorite dish was fried onions; his death from cancer of stomach it is claimed also was probably caused from his excessive indulgence of this fondness for the odorous vegetable.

The onion is undoubtedly a wholesome article of food, in fact has many medicinal qualities of value, but it would be difficult to find a more indigestible article than fried onions, and to many people they are simply poison, but the onion does not stand alone in this respect. Any article of food that is not thoroughly digested becomes a source of disease and discomfort whether it be fried onions or beef steak.



The reason why any wholesome food is not promptly digested is because the stomach lacks some important element of digestion; some stomachs lack peptone, others are deficient in gastric juice, still others lack Hydro chloric acid.

The one thing necessary to do in any case of poor digestion is to supply those elements of digestion which the stomach lacks, and nothing does this so thoroughly and safely as Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

Dr. Richardson in writing a thesis on treatment of dyspepsia and indigestion, closes his remarks by saying, "for those suffering from acid dyspepsia, shown by sour, watery risings, or for flatulent dyspepsia shown by gas on stomach, causing heart trouble and difficult breathing, as well as for all other forms of stomach trouble, the safest treatment is to take one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after each meal. I advise them because they contain no harmful drugs, but are composed of valuable digestives, which act promptly upon the food eaten. I never knew a case of indigestion or even chronic dyspepsia which Stuart's Tablets would not reach."

Cheap cathartic medicines claiming to cure dyspepsia and indigestion can have no effect whatever in actively digesting the food and to call any cathartic medicine a cure for indigestion is a misnomer.

Every druggist in the United States and Canada sells Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and they are not only the safest and most successful but the most scientific of any treatment for indigestion and stomach troubles.

These questions troubled the detective and for a time remained unanswered.

Brant was still in the employ of the road, acting as fireman on the engine he had fired for years; the engineer, a man who had been advanced upon Hastings' disappearance. This engineer Detective Sargeant took into his confidence, and a suspicion which had crossed his mind he laid before him, a theory which caused Philip Ingalls to stare at the detective in horror and amazement.

One evening in the spring of the year, some four months after the disappearance of Hastings, the Cannon Ball Express started on its regular trip east. In the cab besides the fireman and engineer was a gentleman who knew a great deal about John Brant, yet of whom Brant knew nothing, the engineer merely introducing him as a friend who was anxious to make the trip on the engine.

The express was thundering along at a high rate of speed, a cloud of dust, smoke and cinders hovering about the train. The heat within the cab was terrific when the door to the firebox was open, which was most of the time. The engineer's hand was on the throttle, the detective (for as you have undoubtedly already guessed, the stranger was none other than he) standing directly behind him.

Suddenly the fireman dropped his shovel and staggered backward toward the tender. At the same instant a voice seemed to issue from the seething firebox, an agonized cry that wailed above the roar of the express.

"John! John!"

The detective sprang to the fireman's side, seized him by the arm and dragged him before the open door to the firebox.

"See! See!" he shouted, "a face, a face, do you not see it in the flames, man?"

Again the uncanny cry issued from the fierce fire. Every drop of blood receded from Brant's face leaving it ashen. The next instant he had swooned.

Having moved the prostrate form to one side, Engineer Ingalls bade the detective take his seat and keep a sharp watch while he took the fireman's place.

"Sir," said the detective, addressing the engineer while Brant was still unconscious, "that man killed Hastings and threw his body into the firebox. When as a ventriloquist I threw my voice into the fire and it seemed to him that one from the dead was beseeching him from the flames, his expression of horror and alarm was such as to have been capable of convincing the most skeptical. I have made no mistake. John Brant is the guilty man."

When the Cannon Ball Express arrived at its destination the detective, followed by the engineer, led the fireman to the room of the superintendent, who, though the hour was midnight, in accordance with the detective's wish was yet in his office.

"John Brant," said the detective, locking the door, "John Brant, you killed George Hastings and burned his body in the firebox of the engine."

For an instant the fireman stood before the men, his breath coming in gasps, the sweat standing out on his forehead in great drops.

"Yes, yes, I did kill him," cried Brant at last, "I killed him,—but it was to save my train and the express we pass at the siding at Franklin."

"Be seated, Mr. Brant," said the superintendent, speaking kindly.

As the fireman took the proffered chair he drew a folded paper from his pocket.

"That night," said the fireman, "Hastings had been acting strangely from the time he stepped into the cab. Muttered something about the road not using him 'white', and that that night he was going to square things before he reached the city. At first I paid little attention to his talk. Finally, however, I noticed that he was urging the engine faster than was customary, and I asked him what he was trying to do.

"'Do you see this map?' said Hastings, pointing to this piece of paper which he took from his pocket, 'here is where we are now, John. Twenty miles ahead, here at this point is the Franklin siding, where we usually pass the express. I am going to pass the siding ahead of time to-night, John. The express will be coming as usual and we shall meet it somewhere between these two points, meet it, and then, then I shall be square with those who are trying to down me, John.'"

Speechless with astonishment the superintendent, detective and engineer stared at the fireman as he continued with his story.

"Then I understood that Hastings was indeed mad," said the fireman, passing his hand across his brow. "I attempted to reason with him, but nothing seemed to move him in the least. We were fast approaching the express and if I was to act I must act quickly. Hastings' eyes were fastened to the gleaming rails. I saw my opportunity and seized it. The shovel was in my hands, and before he was aware of my intention, I felled him with it. Like a log he dropped at my feet. I closed the throttle, applied the brakes, and the next instant reversed the engine. All this took less than ten seconds. One glance told me that Hastings was dead; I had struck him harder than I had intended, and there he was dead at my feet and I had murdered him.

"In an instant it flashed upon me that nothing stood between me and conviction on the charge of murder. The train was coming to a stop and inside of half a minute the train hands would be by the engine. Then in a moment of weakness, sirs, I thought to hide the crime, forgetting that the disappearance of Hastings would have to be accounted for. The door to the firebox was open and within was a terrible fire burning under the forced draft. Taking Hastings in my arms, I threw him upon the fire, closing the door to hide the horrible sight. Scarcely was the act accomplished when the train stopped and the hands ran ahead to the engine. Some story had to be told to satisfy the men and I told the first thing that came to mind—that Hastings had fallen out of the cab. Immediately a search was instituted and while this was going on, Hastings' body was burned to ashes."

Every word that the man uttered bore the stamp of truth and when the fireman had ceased speaking all three men sprang forward, grasping Brant's hands.

"Not a murderer, but a hero!" said the superintendent, laying his hand on the fireman's shoulder.

A few weeks later a vacancy was made on one of the through trains, the engineer being discharged for some infraction of the company's rules. Several trusted engineers sent in applications for promotion to his position, but already had the company made a choice. John Brant was the man named for the position and he is holding it to-day, one of the few men on the engineer's seat who have no black marks opposite their names.

INFANTICIDE.

HOW CHILDREN ARE SENT TO DESTRUCTION.

Now and then some city paper contains the story of a case of child murder, which revolts and appalls the reader. The mother hugs her own darling close to her breast as she thinks of that little, white, cold body, with the marks of fiendish fingers on the throat. She kisses her baby passionately with all her life in her lips, ready to be spent for the helpless nursling she loves.

And yet just such a mother as this, devoted, tender, loving, may be responsible for a case of infanticide as pitiful as that other, though less terrible than it. These cases of child destruction are just as true, just as palpable to science as if the mother had launched the boat to carry her child over the cataract to destruction.

WHAT MATERNITY MEANS, is considered by women generally with relation to themselves rather than to their offspring. They do not stop to think that their physical and mental condition will stamp the coming infant, and that that infant's life will be a lifelong echo of the mother's moods and feelings during the pre-natal period. The mother owes it to the child to take care of herself. She should be comfortable in body and composed in mind. She should be free from nervousness and pain. She should eat well, sleep well and enjoy life without a moment's dread or anxiety for the future.

The majority of women would cry out that such a condition is impossible for them. They always suffer in the months of waiting. They always have nausea and headache. They are always fretful and nervous, and dread the time of travail which is to come. And the average woman thinks of these conditions as the debt which her sex must pay to Nature. But these conditions are unnatural. These aches, pains and sufferings are due to womanly diseases, and these diseases can be cured, and are being cured every day in the year.

"I am twenty-seven years old," writes Mrs. Euphemia Falconer, of Trent, Muskegon Co., Mich.; "I have been married ten years. I am the mother of four children. My first two babies were still-born, and I suffered everything but death. My friends all thought I could never recover. I was reduced to 109 pounds. When I was three months along for my third child I was taken with hemorrhage or flooding, and came near having a mishap from female weakness. For two months I was under the care of our doctor, but was getting weaker all the time until one day I happened to come across one of your little books, and I read it through, and the next day I sent and got three bottles of 'Favorite Prescription' and one bottle of 'Pellets.' I improved so fast I continued to take your medicine until baby was born, and he is healthy and all right. He is four years old. My baby girl is two years old. My health has been good ever since. I now weigh 165 pounds."

WONDERFUL BUT TRUE.

The cures of womanly diseases performed by Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription are wonderful but true. It is wonderful that a woman who had not borne a living child should bear two healthy children as the result of the use of "Favorite Prescription." It is wonderful that from "suffering everything but death" at the birth hour a woman should find her time of travail made practically painless when "Favorite Prescription" had been taken in preparation for the event. It is wonderful that a condition of weakness and emaciation should be changed to a condition of health and heartiness, the greatness of that change being best expressed by the figures showing the increase in weight from 109 to 165 pounds. No figures could show the gain in happiness which comes with such a cure.

"Words can't express how grateful I am for your kind advice and good medicines," writes Mrs. Ada Brooks, of Kirbyville, Taney Co., Missouri. "I suffered for four years with what four physicians pronounced ulceration and prolapsus. Also inflammation of bladder and urethra. My case was chronic and complicated. When my first child was born (five years ago), I was in a very bad condition, suffering from bladder trouble. My health had been very poor for some time when I was taken down bed-fast. I was in a critical condition for five months. Had several good physicians, but kept getting worse. Could not bear to be moved from my bed. I kept getting worse all the time. Had been confined to my bed five months when I wrote to you. I received your reply very soon and then dismissed my physician and began taking Dr. Pierce's medicines. I took eight bottles of his 'Favorite Prescription' and 'Golden Medical Discovery,' and I began to get better at once. In two months I could sit up in a chair and kept getting better. In four months could do all my house work, including washing and sewing. I think your medicines saved me from the grave, and I will recommend them to all suffering women. Several of my lady friends are taking your medicines with good effect."

DON'T STAY SICK.

There is nothing so useless as the unnecessary suffering of women from diseases peculiar to their sex. These diseases are absolutely and altogether curable by the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. If there is irregularity of the periods the "Prescription" regulates them. If there are debilitating drains, they are dried up by the "Prescription." If there is inflammation or ulceration "Favorite Prescription" cures it, and just as surely cures female weakness, bearing down pains and other forms of feminine disorders.

That bare statement of plain facts fails to do the subject justice.

When it is barely said, "a woman has been cured of female weakness by the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription," such a statement conveys no hint of the form rounding out into graceful curves; of the cheeks full and touched with the red tint of healthy blood; of the eyes bright and sparkling; of the whole body strong and healthy so that work is a blessing instead of a burden. Yet all these things do come to women cured of disease by the use of "Favorite Prescription."

Women suffering from disease in chronic form are invited to consult Dr. Pierce, by letter, free. All correspondence is held in strictest privacy and treated as a sacred confidence.

For more than thirty years Dr. R. V. Pierce has been chief consulting physician to the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y. In that time aided by his medical staff of nearly a score of physicians, he has treated and cured over half a million women. There is no other offer of free consultation by letter made by a specialist in the treatment and cure of women's diseases, such as is Dr. R. V. Pierce. Women who have found other advice and treatment ineffective should not fail to write to Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

"Favorite Prescription" contains no alcohol and is entirely free from opium, cocaine and all other narcotics.

The dealer who offers a substitute medicine as "just as good" as Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, cares less for the health of his customer than for the extra profit made on the sale of preparations of less merit. Insist on having the "Prescription" which has cured so many other women.

THE PASSING OF POKER JACK.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY E. E. WILSON.

Copyright, 1900, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

"IS IT you, Dick? And you are one of us? Raise my head a little so that I can see your face. That's right—now I can see it. Yes, you are the same old Dick, only a little older. Dear old fellow, it's good to have you with me at this time—to have my hand in yours once again. You'll stay with me 'til the end comes, won't you, Dick? Don't scold, please. Yes, I knew you'd not leave me, but I wanted to hear you say it—it'll be easier for me to go, having you with me.

"And what's the news from the front?—have we won? What's that?—you say the Spaniards are in retreat, and the hill is ours? And is the flag waving there? Hurrah for that! Raise me higher, old fellow, so that I can see it, (Ah-h-h! that Mauser did its work well, my strength's almost gone. No, don't curse the man that did it; he only did his duty, and I—and I welcome the death his bullet brought me.) Ah, there they are, the flags! Dick, it's a glorious sight! It's queer, the reverence one has for those bits of starry cloth. The boys'll keep them there, won't they, Dick? Yes, I knew they would; that's the kind of men they are. Now lay me back on the ground—I'm tired; my life is going fast and I want to talk of other things.

"You ask why I want to die? That is what I want to tell you about, and your question carries me right to where I must begin—back to the time when you and I were partners—wild young devils—down there in Mexico. Dick, you knew her—Dolores, my wife, I mean. Hush! don't say a word; I know you loved her too, and it would have been far better had she loved you instead of me. Poor old fellow! I remember as though it were but yesterday how you paled and trembled when I told you that she had promised to marry me; and how you left me without a word, to see me no more until now. Forgive me, Dick, the pain I gave you then; until that moment I did not know that you loved her. (Raise my head a little, old man. There, that is easier.) Dick, what was I to win her love?—the love of the purest, sweetest woman that ever lived. A gambler—everything that is bad; an adventurer—a man without a name or home. Yet she did love me, God bless her! preferring me to the scores of lovers of her own people that flocked about her.

"How the people stared when we were married! even the priest seemed to wonder how one so beautiful and high-born, one so spotless and pure as she could mate with me—with Poker Jack, the gambler. (You turn away; am I tiring you, old fellow? No? Then I will tell you the rest.) But we cared nothing for what others thought; we thought only of one another; and wishing to be undisturbed in our happiness, we went to live at Los Ojos, an estate of hers far back in the foothills of the Sierra Madre—I wanted to buy a home nearer to civilization, but she would not let me use my money, telling me that, won at cards, it was accursed; and so I gave it all to the Sisters. You smile? Dick, you don't know the hold a pure, good wife has on a man, especially if he loves her as I loved Dolores. Such love is a holy thing, and it purified me, driving out of me all that was bad. Why, Dick, without an effort I gave up cards—everything of my old life; and I learned her religion—learned to pray! Just think of that, Dick; Poker Jack praying, and in earnest!

"For three years, back there in the wild foothills, with only the servants and ranch hands, we lived a life of perfect happiness—a dream of love and joy; and then our child was born. Born to die within the week, poor little fellow! He had her eyes, Dick! And what a blow that was—I thought it would kill Dolores! (Lift up my shoulders a little; I am choking.)

"Just then, before she had entirely recovered her strength—you know how ill-timed some things come, Dick—fires blazing on the mountain tops flashed along the Sierras the message: 'The Apaches are raiding; defend yourselves!' You know what that meant; a whirlwind of fire and blood—a war of extermination, when even the most cowardly fight to the last breath. Hurriedly the widely scattered ranchers gathered at Los Ojos to consult concerning the defense of the lives of their families; the soldiers were all far away, and we had to depend upon ourselves. It was decided that we should be the first to strike—to surprise the Indians if possible; and I was chosen leader.

"When I told Dolores that I must leave her she heard without a protest—without a word to weaken me; but I will never forget how she looked, holding me tight in her arms, and gazing with her great dark eyes into mine. Ah! Dick, women are far nobler, braver than men think them! It was much easier for me to leave her, to brave the dangers and hardships of the campaign, than for her to see me go. We started that morning. Two days later we were overtaken by a handsome young fellow, a Mexican, who brought me a letter from my wife. He was her cousin, Carlos Montez by name, just from the South, she wrote; he wished to go with us to help in driving back the Indians, and she placed him in my care. We were glad to have him, I particularly so, for he had the face and eyes of Dolores, and something of her voice. (Give me another pull at your canteen, old man, I am growing feverish.)

"The next day we struck the Apache trail, and following it, we came upon the Indians that night. Instantly we attacked, surprising the red devils while they slept, and though the fight was a hot one and sometimes in doubt, we ended by giving them a complete thrashing. They scattered into the mountains, but only to come together again—you know what it is to fight Apaches, it's like catching a flea. A week afterward we struck the band again, and in the fight that followed, I would have lost my life but for Carlos; stunned by a glancing bullet, I lay directly in the Apache fire, and he, unmindful of the bullets, rushed to where I lay and carried me to cover behind the rocks. This time we gave the Indians a stunning blow, scattering them for good; and with light hearts, we turned our faces homeward.

"When within a few miles of Los Ojos my horse cast a shoe, going lame, and in spite of my burning impatience to get on, I was compelled to go slowly; but Carlos galloped on ahead. It was night when I at last arrived; and as I sprang to the ground, I was met by a servant, an old man, tried and true I thought him, who whispered that he had seen a handsome young man steal into my wife's room a few minutes before. (May he roast forever in hell for the slander.) Quick as a flash I struck him full in the face, knocking him down; but the harm was done. Like an angry bull, blindly, furiously, I rushed into the house and on to my wife's room; and coming out of her door I met Carlos. Seeing me his face paled, and he drew back in alarm; but he was too slow. Before he could escape I had thrown myself upon him, clutching him by the throat; and with a savage lunge I drove my knife into his heart.

"Oh, God! If I were to live a thousand years, Dick, always would ring in my ears the cry of agony that burst from those dying lips: "'Dear husband, it is I, Dolores, your wife.'"

"I knew you would shiver and turn from me in horror, Dick—God knows I don't blame you—but stay a few minutes longer and hear it all. Death is very near to me now: already the chill is stealing over me. For pity's sake stay with me until the end, old fellow.

"She lived long enough to tell me that she forgave me, and that she loved me still; then died. And I—my mind gave way, Dick, and when my reason returned I found myself hundreds of miles away, in Arizona. In the long years that have dragged by since then I have dared every danger of the frontier: Indians, outlaws, floods, the desert's thirst—everything, seeking death; and at last, here in Cuba I—find—my—rest. Hold me—closer—old—man—I am—going—now. Are the flags still—waving—on—the—hill? Dolores, querida mia—"

He was dead!

HAZING A FRESHMAN.

A TRUE STORY.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY BURTON MCPHAIL.

CURTIS was finding it decidedly u p-h i l l work fighting his way through college on what he could earn during vacation. The studies were sufficient to worry most of the men, but Curtis was continually harassed by cold and hunger, to say nothing of his college bill and stationer's account. It was no wonder that each week he was growing thinner and paler, a troubled look forever haunting his face.

The rest of the men knew something of the terrible struggle and would have helped Curtis, but the brave fellow's pride forbade advances on their part.

"Something has got to be done for Hal, or he won't be here many more weeks," said Bert Van Reuter, addressing several college men who had gathered in his room one evening. "I called to see him last evening and found him satisfying the inner man with crackers and water; I tell you, boys, I didn't enjoy my supper a bit for thinking of Hal and his crackers."

"Is it as bad as that?" asked Frank Murray. "I knew he was having a hard time, but that's too much; why, boys, Hal is starving."

"Yes, bad as that, and worse," replied Van Reuter. "There wasn't a spark of fire in his room, the frost an eighth of an inch thick on his window, and he was trying to keep warm with a blanket wrapped about him. 'You had better keep your coat on, Bert,' he said in his pathetic way, 'the fire's a bit low,' and he tried to make believe he was not eating supper, but just a lunch. I understood, boys, though I said nothing."

"But what can we do?" asked Murray. "Hal is proud and would not accept a cent from any of us."

For a moment Van Reuter looked perplexed.

"I know," he said at length, "let's haze him!"

"Haze him!" ejaculated the young men in chorus.

"Yes, haze him, boys," replied Van Reuter, "pretend to; take him out in a blanket some night and carry him to some room, lock him in, and while he is away carpet his room, put a quarter of a ton of coal in his coal box, fill up his wood box, leave twenty weeks' meal-tickets on his table, get the books and stationery he needs, and settle his account with the college. It will take considerable money to do all this, but if we all put our shoulders to the wheel it can be done. There are a hundred men who can easily give three dollars apiece, and fifty who can hand out a V. It will be the best kind of a hazing and I guess the faculty will offer no objections."

That very evening Van Reuter received permission from the faculty and with a list headed by a contribution of five dollars from the president of the college and each of those gathered in Van Reuter's room, he went from room to room receiving amounts varying from fifty cents to five dollars. It was the kind of a hazing that interested every man in the college and those who were able to give were not slow in responding. And when two days later all the men had been seen, Van Reuter held six hundred and forty dollars with which to carry out the proposed hazing.

Curtis was shivering in his room, endeavoring to master a perplexing problem. Somehow this night his thoughts were of home. He wondered if the old folks suspected the truth concerning him. There, no doubt, a cheery fire brightened the home; here, frost curtained the window and the dismal wail of the wind made more desolate the college-room.

"There is no use in trying to hold out much longer," he was saying. "I can't meet my bills and——"

"We're after you, Curtis," said Bert Van Reuter, throwing open the door, dispensing with the ceremony of knocking; "come on boys, I've got hold of him; get your blanket ready.

"Sorry to disturb you, Hal," said Van Reuter, placing his hand over Curtis' mouth, "but you can't get through college without being hazed, and we've come for you."

Curtis tried hard to smile, though it was a ghastly sort of an effort. He wondered when his trials would end; had he not enough to contend with already? He was charitable enough, however, to believe that none of the men would have attempted the hazing had they known just how matters stood with him.

Into the blanket they bundled Curtis, and tying the four corners together they started out of the room, bearing their burden through the long corridors, down the steps and across the campus to an empty room which had been heated for the occasion; and there they left the bewildered fellow, loosing the ends of the blanket and locking him in the room.

"Now, boys, for some work," said Van Reuter, as they came away; "the first thing to do is to fill Hal's coal box, and if it isn't big enough we must get another, but get the coal that was dumped in the yard up to his room, we must. Murray, go to my room and get that box of books I bought at Amee's, and Moulton, go with him and bring along the carpet we bought, and don't forget the tacks; they are on the table. Prescott and I will be attending to the coal and wood."

Over the long flights of stairs the two young men traveled, bearing the baskets of coal. It was hard work—work they were unused to, but they liked it nevertheless, for somehow they could almost see Curtis standing in the middle of his room, looking with astonished and delighted eyes on the changes wrought in his absence. It was evident that the box was built precisely for a quarter of a ton of coal, for when the last basketful was turned in, it was just rounding-full. Then the wood was piled into the wood-box and that which they were unable to store therein, they piled in the corner of the closet.

"Now out with the table and chairs, boys," said Van Reuter, addressing the young men who had arrived with the books and carpet, "and we will have the carpet down in short order; I will be sweeping out the dirt we have brought in."

Other men who had completed their studies for the evening and certain ones who had not done so, were on hand watching operations, ready to lend a hand if it were needed.

Willing hands make short work, and it was not many minutes before Van Reuter and Murray were down on their knees driving in the tacks at a merry tempo, Moulton and Prescott meanwhile opening the box of books and arranging them on the table, which as soon as the carpet had been laid was returned to the room.

"There," said Van Reuter, straightening up, "bring the chairs back, boys, and start a roaring fire in the stove, and we'll be ready for Hal; the meal-tickets, receipts from the college and the money that was left I'm going to leave here on the table where he will see it first thing when he enters, and if he doesn't shut his door too quick, we will have the richest treat of the year.

"It's too bad the room opposite couldn't have been heated to-night," continued Van Reuter, "but as it is not, we will have to stand the cold, but being empty, it will hold more of us, boys, and there's some consolation in that. I'll go and unlock Curtis now; be sure you are all in there when he arrives, though I shall try desperately to reach here ahead of him."

Out across the campus Van Reuter hastened, anxious to see the crowning moment of this unique hazing.

"Come out, Hal," said Van Reuter, throwing open the door that held Curtis a prisoner, "we decided to let you off easy, seeing that you gave us no trouble."

Without pausing for Curtis to make reply, Van Reuter hastened away, fearing lest Curtis should hurry back to his own room, giving him no opportunity to reach the room where the rest of the students were waiting to enjoy the climax of the plot. And it was well he did so, for Curtis the instant he was liberated, donning his great coat, which Murray had thoughtfully brought when they bore Curtis thither in the blanket, started for his room, quickening his steps as he encountered the sharp wind.

As Curtis crossed the avenue, he saw several pieces of kindling wood, which had evidently fallen from some passing team, and with a feeling akin to joy he gathered them into his arms, looking hastily around to see if any of the college boys had observed him. It meant a warm room for an hour or so, and his eyes brightened.

"The boys did me a good turn without knowing it," he said as he hurried on, "I shall be warm before going to bed, and that is something out of the ordinary."

Van Reuter had scarcely arrived when Curtis was heard on the stairs, his heavy step being easily recognized.

"He's coming," whispered Murray, "be quiet, boys!"

Down the corridor came Curtis, carrying the kindlings in his arm. Arriving at his door, he threw it open and entered. Suddenly he stopped short, dropping the kindlings in the middle of the floor.

"Excuse me!" he said hastily gathering up the wood, "I—I thought this was my room!"

On the opposite side of the corridor forty young men were holding onto their sides and stuffing their handkerchiefs into their mouths.

Closing the door behind him, Curtis retreated from his room, pausing before the door on the right and looking sharply at the number.

"Boys," whispered Murray from his position where he could look over the transom, "boys, he's at Stuart's room, trying to make out the number."

"It's my number, all right," said Curtis, returning to his own door, "but—but," he hesitated, "it isn't my room."

It was cold standing there and his teeth chattered.

"I—I don't understand it," he said, placing the kindlings on the floor and passing his hand across his head in a bewildered sort of a way. "I'll knock and perhaps whoever it is that rooms here will set things right."

Timidly rapping, Curtis waited for a moment, but no response coming from within, he knocked so loudly that the building echoed.

"I guess that will bring him," he said, grimly. "Passing strange!" he said, "my number!"

Suddenly he turned the knob to the door, hesitated for an instant, and then walked in.

The light from the stove door cast a flickering glow over the objects in the room, and as the poor fellow saw the familiar furniture, light seemed to break upon him, and a look of intense joy and gratitude swept over his troubled face.

The door to the room where the students were gathered had been noiselessly opened, and they all stood there watching Curtis' every movement. They were not laughing now, somehow they saw the pathetic side of the situation, and more than one found a lump rising in his throat.

And then Curtis dropped into a chair before the fire, a speechless heap of humanity.

Somehow as the young men stood there it dawned upon them that that was not the place for them, and they sought to escape.

Curtis heard the movement and sprang to his feet, advancing bravely to meet them.

"Boys," said he, his voice trembling, "boys, I can't say much to you to-night; I guess you won't expect it; I can only say that I thank you."

"You had better carry these kindlings into your closet, Hal," said Van Reuter.

And as Curtis crossed his room, the students disappeared down the corridor, leaving Curtis alone.

It was late that night before Curtis realized all that had been done for him, the envelope containing the meal-tickets and the balance of the money, lying unnoticed upon the table; it was late and the morning's lessons were untouched, but the professors passed lightly over his failures that day.

A Young Lawyer's Preference.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY ANNIE BRASHER.

HE was sitting under a huge chestnut tree near the little cabin schoolhouse on the hill. The sounds of the children's laughter as they played at the spring down the path came to her ear, giving form to her reverie. Looking up she saw a horseman descending a hill a mile and a half away. She recognized him as Joel Guines and her thoughts were turned into another channel. His was a character to suggest speculation. Born in a cabin on the mountain, poor and illiterate, with indomitable energy he had worked his way through the school at Linden, the county-seat, then taught in the country to acquire means with which to attend the law school of Tennessee at Lebanon.

He was now a lawyer with a fair practice and an ambition which looked to the legislature. Contact with the world had rubbed off some of his angularities of character and provincialism of manner, but the veneer of polish had never been applied to his moral nature. He was ashamed of his family and of his poverty. Every feeling was subservient to his ambition and his vanity. Watching his descent the young teacher thought of the story whispered abroad that this young aspirant for office could only win by paying a unique price. A rich old hayseed farmer, ex-legislator and political wire-puller had for years controlled the republican and third-party vote of the district; to hope to succeed in either party was to gain his influence. He was quite a Warwick in a small way. Upon this young man, the old politician's only child, a plain, yellow-faced woman of middle life, had set her fancy. By marrying her he could be elected. She would bring him a river farm and a few thousand dollars in cash. The force of character and energy which he had displayed had excited the interest of the young teacher, and she was wondering if his ambition would pay such a price for its gratification, when she saw him leave the main road and come up the hill to the schoolhouse.

As he dismounted and tied his horse to a tree, she noticed an expression of suppressed excitement and great nervousness of manner.

"I was going by here to Flatwoods and I thought I'd bring your mail, Miss Pauline," he said, handing her several letters. She thanked him, then was impelled to look up by the intense gaze which she felt was fixed upon her face.

"Miss Pauline," he said, seating himself upon a bench in front of her, "I heard in Linden that you would leave Perry County to-morrow for good; is it so?"

"Quite true," she answered, "I have finished my work here. The children will have their spelling match and recite their speeches after recess, then I shall dismiss them forever."

He nervously twirled his hands. "I knew it had to be some time, but I wasn't expecting it so soon."

His manner puzzled her. His eyes were fixed moodily upon the ground. Sighing deeply he said:

"God knows I wish you had never come here; that I had never set eyes on your face!"

"Mr. Guines!" she asked in amazement, "what do you mean?"

"You know what I mean. You know that I love you with all my heart and soul, and that it just breaks me up to know that I'll never see you again after to-day!"

A flush of outraged pride stained her face. Anger scintillated in her eyes. Her lips curled in superb disdain. She was almost stricken dumb with the magnitude of his presumption. He had not raised his head and did not see the effect of his words. In a moment the girl's manner changed. The flush faded from her cheeks and the spirit of anger made way for a thousand sprites of merriment. The disdainful lips relaxed into smiles which with difficulty she restrained from breaking into laughter.

"I've had no peace ever since you came. I can't sleep at night weighing you against ambition in my mind. I think sometimes that I'd rather live with you in the poorest mountain cabin, than with any other woman in a palace. I know you have reason to complain of the way I've acted; I've followed you like a shadow, I've showed by every way in the world except speaking out, that I loved you, and all the time I knew I couldn't do that; that there was no chance for me. I don't mean that I'm afraid of any other man, I'm not. I want to make something of myself, to climb higher all the time. I'll have to marry money to win position and influence. There is only one way in which I can do that, and God only knows how bitter the pill is. Miss Pauline, loving you as I do, loving you as I must, it just makes me heart-sick thinking of what might be if I was a rich man or you a rich woman."

She looked at him as if she had discovered some rare anomaly in the animal kingdom, but she gently said:

"I understand your position. You must marry some woman who can advance your political career."

"Yes, that's just it, and you——"

"Could not have done so," she supplemented.

"I hope you won't feel that I've treated you wrong; after all, you know you haven't said you loved me, I don't know what your answer would have been if I could have asked you to marry me."

"No, you do not know."

He arose to go. The color had faded from his bronzed face, his lips twitched. He held her slight hand for a moment in his trembling clasp. He took in every detail of the picture she made; the simple dress, the delicate bloom of her face, her winsome grace.

"God knows," said he huskily, "that in telling you good-by, I'm saying the word to my own heart's happiness. I love you better than all this world holds, and yet only last night I asked Tildy Ledbetter to marry me."

A wave of pity swept over the girl's face, his emotion was so intensely sincere.

"That was best perhaps," she said, "I do not think you will ever regret; it and now it is time to call the children."

The Tennessee election was over. The popular candidate of the democratic party had been elected governor. The enthusiasm attending his election was scarcely greater than that which was excited by the victory of the young "silver tongued orator" of Middle Tennessee, who had won in the congressional race.

West and Middle Tennessee furnished the usual number of democratic representatives, with the exception of the eighth district, which elected Joel Guines, republican. He came at once to Nashville with his wife.

The inauguration of the governor was followed by a magnificent ball, a farewell compliment to the young congressman whose marriage had just been consummated. The flower laden air pulsated with the melody from the orchestra. Nashville's beauty and gallantry were gathered there, gliding through the waltz in graceful rhythm with the music, tete-a-tete in some restful alcove, or gathered in congenial groups, where wit, repartee and laughter ruled the hour.

With his wife Joel Guines had been wandering aimlessly around. Suddenly she clutched his arm and exclaimed:

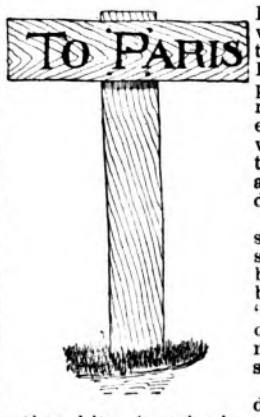
"Great Spoons! Joel, if yander ain't that school teacher who tried so hard to ketch you las' summer. She's dyked out fit to kill; look! there she is a talkin' to the Governor!"

He looked in the direction indicated. There she stood in all the glory of her regal womanhood. He had seen her in the simple dress of the mountains, with the waves of her shining hair drawn smoothly from her brow. Now she wore her bridal dress, a creation in French art of pearly satin and mist-like lace, and from the coronet of her hair flashed diamond stars. She was the center of a glittering circle, queen of love and beauty. Joel Guines stood as though stunned. His wife pulled at his arm but he shook her off. He was listening intently to the conversation of two gentlemen near him.

"Nashville's loss will be Washington's gain, which I believe is the consolation of obituaries. With what charming grace Tennessee's belle will take her place in the court circles of the capital."

"This marriage is the consummation of a long engagement, is it not?" asked one gentleman.

"Yes, dating back to the summer she spent in Europe. Two Tennessee people must needs go to Paris to fall in love. It is an ideal marriage. Both are eminently wealthy, talented, and popular."



"Where did Miss Baxter spend the summer? I did not meet her anywhere."

"Have you not heard of her last summer's romantic adventure? She has great literary talent which she wished to develop. She was particularly anxious to make a study of the denizens of the backwoods. For this cause our dainty belle betook herself to "the hill country" of Perry. She identified herself with the people and taught school in order to study child-nature. She went to camp-meetings, barn-dances, fish-frys, funerals and weddings, and the result is she has written a booklet which has forever established her literary fame. It is as fresh as the mountain breezes and as pure as its dew. It is the book of the season. Irresistible in its beautiful and artistic blending of wit, humor and pathos."

Joel caught his breath as he listened. He looked once more on her radiant, lovely face, then caught his wife's arm and mutely turned away.

A FEATURE OF 1900.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE Paris Exposition, which bids well to be the greatest World's Fair of this age of prosperity and progress, is of great interest to us all, even if we are not expecting to join the throngs already headed in that direction.

Such palaces, though still in an embryo state, have never yet been seen, and the buildings of the "White City" in '93 dwindle into insignificance in comparison.

An amusing anecdote is told which rather hits America in a tender spot. At a recent Convention of Architects in Paris, a vote was taken of the country which presented plans for the handsomest building, and on Italy was conferred the preference. Then in way of a joke a vote was taken for the country presenting the ugliest building, and the United States received that vote almost unanimously.

As yet, the only completed building on the Exposition grounds is the Trocadero Palace and this was built for the Exposition in 1878. It is a mammoth edifice on the right bank of the Seine with a semi-circular front surmounted by two towers two hundred and seventy-five feet in height and is, taking it as a whole, very oriental in its architecture.

Although called a palace, it is in reality a gallery devoted to science and art, where are found some of the most historical collections in Europe. The concert hall, in the main body, seats sixty thousand people. It is called Trocadero from a Spanish fort captured by the French early in this century. Around the palace considerable extent of ground will be devoted to the industries, characteristics and amusements of the different nations.

Japan, China, Korea, Liberia and Russia will be represented. Japanese villages, dancing dervishes, rug weavers of India, in short a midway on an enormous scale, with probably the inevitable ostrich farm, congress of beauties and the howling streets of Cairo under new and alluring names. It has been well said that the American idea of Europe's cheapness would better be forgotten for 1900. The sole arrangement that is within the reach of the smallest purse, is that a camera may be admitted to the grounds for the total sum of one dime. That seems very moderate and from this fact we conclude that those of us who remain at home will probably have a condensed view of the nations in "snap-shots".

Beside the palace previously mentioned, standing at present on the Exposition grounds is the far-famed Eiffel Tower, which, too, was a feature of '78. Contrary to public opinion when it was being erected, this tower is a unique work of art and an ornament to the entire city, and is the highest structure man ever built. Stoddard calls it "a miracle of strength and lightness." The tower is made up of fifteen thousand sections and forty draughtsmen worked for two years on these different parts to make it symmetrical and exact.

Elevators run to the top of the tower and in its galleries and corridors, restaurants and theaters, ten thousand people can gather at one time. The Eiffel tower has been truly called the "vertical city."

So with all the excitement and wonders to see in Paris' normal state, when the Exposition opens and the city is full to overflowing, sights of a lifetime may be crowded into a very short visit.

"Come to Paris and take a walk around the world and rub elbows, as it were, with the universe."

Stories Which Mrs. Livermore Tells.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

NO woman in the country is more respected and beloved than Mrs. Mary A. Livermore. I once heard her tell in most amusing way how she was not allowed to enter college. She was speaking of Radcliffe, and the many women's colleges now making so many opportunities which the girls of her day never had.

"It was when I was sixteen years old," said Mrs. Livermore, "so it must have been over sixty years ago. Five other girls and myself wanted to go to college so much that we decided to beard the lion in his den, and ask the officials of Harvard to let us enter there. We knew we were just as well qualified as many of the boys, and better than some of them, for we had studied right along in the high school with boys who had already entered.

"So we went and called upon the president, and told him what we wanted. Do you know we were hardly treated with respect, it was such an unheard of thing. 'Why, what you want to learn is how to cook a steak and make coffee for the men who go to college.'

"Then he opened the door and actually turned us out of the room. I had had to promise, before I was allowed to go, that I would hold my tongue, because I was known to be rather too quick to speak, but I was so angry at this that when I got to the door I turned around and said—'I just wish I was God for just one hour. I'd kill off every woman in the world, and then let the men see how they would get along without them.'"

What Florence Nightingale was to the English soldiers in the Crimean War, Mrs. Bickerdyke, whom all the soldiers came to call "Mother," was to the men in our own Civil War. Mrs. Livermore, who was closely associated with Mother Bickerdyke in Chicago in the work of the Sanitary Commission, and all through the war, learned to love her dearly, and never tires of talking about her. Not long ago she told me the story of the potatoes which the nurse put in a sick soldier's bed.

"Mother Bickerdyke's experience," said Mrs. Livermore, "transcended that of any other woman. She not only had the instinct which must be born in a person, but she had infinite ingenuity and patience in doing for her sick soldiers many things which an ordinary nurse would never have taken the trouble to do.

"Once a poor young fellow, but little more than a boy in years, who had been wounded and a long time in the hospital, craved a baked potato to eat. Mother Bickerdyke told him he should have it just as soon as it was safe for him to eat it, but weak from illness, his mind continued to cling to the idea of the potato with so much longing that finally, one day, she took four nice, new raw potatoes, washed them carefully and then dried and warmed them. Then bringing them to the bed she said: 'There, my boy, there are four nice potatoes. You shall have them in bed where you can touch them and look at them, and just as soon as it is prudent you shall have one like the best of these cooked to eat.' The sick man was happy as a child with his treasure, contented and quiet.

"The next day when the ward surgeon made his rounds he found the potatoes in the bed, and threw them out on to the floor. Mother Bickerdyke happened to be out of the room at the time, but she came in before he had finished his visit. She saw the potatoes on the floor and the sick man crying.

"'Who threw those potatoes out there?' she asked.

"'I did,' said the surgeon.

"'What did you do that for?'

"'Because they were foolish and unnecessary. I'm not going to have the beds in this hospital made into potato hills.'

"Mother Bickerdyke swooped down on the potatoes and gathered them up in her apron. 'Do you think anything is foolish,' she said, 'which makes a sick man comfortable and happy? Those potatoes couldn't possibly hurt him, for I even warmed them so that they would not be cold to touch; and they made him happy.' Then she went to the bed. 'There my poor boy,' said she, putting the potatoes back in the bed, 'you shall have them, and you shall keep them until they sprout, if you want to.' And he did keep them until he was able to eat his potato baked."

The many friends of Mrs. Livermore all over the country will sympathize with her in the death of her husband, Rev. D. P. Livermore, which has recently occurred at their home at Melrose, Massachusetts. Dr. Livermore was a Universalist minister who had held several important pastorates in and near Boston, but much of his time, especially during the later years of his life, had been given up to editorial work and to helping his wife in her many important literary undertakings. At the time of the dinner given Mrs. Livermore when she was seventy-five years old, when she practically retired from public work, she rendered a most eloquent tribute to her husband, saying that she would never have been able to accomplish a fraction of the work she had done if it had not been for the constant assistance which he had given her.

Saved Her Daughter

The first critical period in a woman's life comes at the passing of her girlhood. How to preserve the daughter's health at this crisis is the problem that confronts every mother of girls. Mrs. J. M. Riggs, of Carterville, Mo., solved this problem. She says:

"My daughter Josie during the winter of 1897-98 suffered a complete break-down in health. She was thin and pale, had no appetite, and was so weak that she was unable to walk to school. Those who knew her condition said that she was in the first stages of consumption. Shortly after school closed, on the advice of a neighbor, we began giving her Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. The effect on her condition was marvelous. Before she had taken half a box her condition was improved, and she kept on gaining appetite, strength and flesh until she was entirely well.

"She took three boxes of the pills and to-day there is not a healthier, more robust looking girl in Carterville. She is fleshier and healthier than ever before in her life."

MRS. J. M. RIGGS.

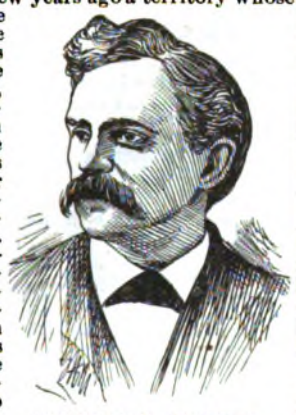
CURRENT TOPICS IN AMERICAN HISTORY

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE.

However much any reader of COMFORT may differ with the general policy which is known as expansion, there can be no doubt but that every one feels an intense interest in the course of the American government now that we are one of the leading powers of the world. The Samoan treaty by which that group of islands was governed by America, Britain and Germany has given way to an agreement by which the group is divided. America holds the island of Tutulia, containing the great harbor of Pago-Pago, where we have held rights to a Naval Station for a number of years and which was the cause of our original interest in the many troubles of the islanders.



As was expected by all observers, Congress had hardly reassembled after the holidays before the Philippine question appeared before both branches in several forms. The most exciting debate was in the Senate early in January. On the 9th of that month Senator Beveridge, a young man of great promise from Indiana, introduced his resolution in a speech which takes high rank in ability and which might be termed the extreme view of an extreme Imperialist.

The resolution read as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the Philippine Islands are territory belonging to the United States; that it is the intention of the United States to retain them as such and to establish and maintain such governmental control throughout the archipelago as the situation may demand. And the speech embodied the personal observations of the Senator during his recent extended visit to the Philippines. The speech, which was widely commented on, was a revelation of the material value and conditions of the islands. In the debate, Senators Hoar of Massachusetts and Pettigrew of South Dakota made strong speeches against the presumable policy of the government to retain the islands in our possession.

There have been three interesting cases in this session of Congress relative to the control which each body has over its own makeup. Nearly the first day of the present session there was presented in the House of Representatives probably the largest petitions which were ever brought before that body, and which were carried up to the Speaker's desk in huge rolls and deposited in an imposing array. These papers represented the signatures of no less than 7,000,000 American women, with an immense array of male petitioners, asking for the exclusion of Brigham H. Roberts from the House of Representatives.

The state of Utah, as our readers will remember, was until a few years ago a territory whose politics were dominated by the Latter Day Saints or, as they are generally known, Mormons. Beside the Mormon population there were nearly as many Gentiles, or people not believing in the Mormon religion. From the beginning the Mormons have believed in polygamy, and although many attempts have been made by the Government to stamp out this blot, nothing was effected until Utah applied for the rights of statehood. At the same time there have been anti-polygamy laws passed, and it was agreed that should the rights of statehood be conferred on Utah no polygamist should ever be elected to any United States office. While there have been very few polygamist marriages since then, many of the Mormons are still living with several wives. In the case of Roberts it is alleged that he had three wives living in different homes. It is hard to find what the real facts in the case are, but it is believed that for some reason the Mormon Church did not support him for Congress, and that his election was almost entirely due to the votes of the Gentiles.

BRIGHAM H. ROBERTS.

A special committee was appointed by Speaker Henderson and held a most searching investigation. The majority of the committee rendered a report excluding Roberts from the House without admission. Mr. Littlefield of Maine and DeArmond of Missouri presented a minority report, asking for his admission and exclusion afterwards. This gave rise to an extremely interesting debate in which Mr. Littlefield made his first speech which clearly placed him in the front rank of ready debaters, and was a masterly effort which received unusually high commendation for a maiden effort. It was believed, however, that should Roberts be admitted to the House his exclusion afterwards might be difficult and raise serious legal questions which could only be settled by the Supreme Court. The vote was overwhelming, being 268 to exclude him without admission, and only 50 in his favor. It is believed by everyone that this strong utterance by the people's representatives will have a wholesome effect, and that polygamists will appreciate hereafter that they must act in good faith toward the Government or receive no recognition.

The other two cases to which we have referred are in the Senate. The first is the case of William A. Clark who was elected United States Senator from Montana. This is a contested election case, although Mr. Clark is apparently elected, and has the certificate. He is charged with wholesale bribery of members of the legislature. By a unanimous decision of the Montana Supreme Court, Attorney General John D. Wellcome of that state was publicly disbarred for acting as agent for Clark in the bribery of various members. Mr. Wellcome was the acknowledged agent of Mr. Clark in the very bitter struggle which took place during the session of the Montana legislature, which it will be remembered was largely the fight of interested capitalists. The claim that Wellcome bribed members of the legislature to vote for Clark was freely made at the time of the contest and was repeated in various reputable newspapers. It was repeated under oath, and publicly proven to the satisfaction of the supreme judges of Montana, which brought about this act of disbarment. The vote being unanimous cannot but have serious influence with the Senatorial committee of privileges and elections, which is now hearing the case. The charge against Senator Clark is bribery, and numerous witnesses who have visited Washington have made most detailed statements of these facts. The sums offered for votes and the incidents surrounding the efforts of Mr. Clark and his agents to secure votes are stated so explicitly and with so little contradiction and are supported with such a wealth of evidence that it will take a great deal of strength on the other side to prove that his election was free from corruption.

Finally, a case that is obtaining much attention both in and out of Congress, and causing endless discussion everywhere, is that of Matthew S. Quay, who has been appointed a Senator from Pennsylvania by the Governor and has appeared in Washington with his certificate, and now his case is before the committee on elections. Mr. Quay is one of the most adroit politicians in the country, and has been uniformly successful. He has held the state of Pennsylvania and the republican party there strongly in his grip, although numerous attempts have been made to oust him from leadership, but none have been successful. He appeared before the last legislature as a candidate for re-election to the Senate, but was unable to obtain within twenty or thirty votes of the necessary majority. Numerous ballotings were held for weeks at Harrisburg, and finally the legislature adjourned without any election. He was immediately appointed by Governor Stone. As there have been one or two similar cases, and that of California still pending, the Quay case has raised a great question whether a governor in such a case should appoint. Those in favor of Mr. Quay's side state that it was intended by the makers of the constitution that there should be two representatives for every state in the upper house at all times; but as the constitution says the governor may appoint in case of a vacancy, the opponents of Mr. Quay claim that it is not mandatory, especially as the legislature by its own act failed to send a successor, and that under no circumstance should a governor be permitted to appoint a senator for a whole term. As there have been three or four states denied half their representation on account of the legislature failing to elect, the oft raised question of a constitutional amendment to permit the people to elect United States senators by direct vote is again being agitated, and is receiving much more attention than usual on account of the prominence of Mr. Quay's case. The majority report, largely signed by democrats, has been received recommending the exclusion of Mr. Quay; while a minority report, signed by some of the republicans of the committee, recommends his admission. When the case is debated before the Senate it will command unusual attention and will be supported and opposed by the best talent in the upper House.

WILLIAM A. CLARK.

As has been pointed out many times, the sentiment of the country is overwhelmingly in favor of the early completion of the Nicaraguan canal. With possessions in the Pacific, and the necessity of quick water communication between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, we have learned the urgent necessity of a shorter route to the Pacific from the East. In the earlier part of February, a treaty was signed between Secretary of State Hay and Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British ambassador, by which the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was abrogated in part. This treaty, which was completed some time in the 40s, provided that any canal built across the Isthmus must be under the joint ownership and control of England and America. Under the terms of the present treaty, England withdraws all claims, but it is stipulated that this canal must forever be neutral water, and that in time of war, ships of any nation may travel it without interference. It is also stipulated that it is not to be fortified at either end. This treaty was received in England with considerable feeling, as it was believed everything had been given the Americans without any reciprocity, and much complaint was made that in ceding their rights the British would not have obtained certain privileges on the Alaskan boundaries and tide waters.

A canvass of Congress showed conclusively that a large majority are in favor of the immediate building of the canal, and it is believed that $140,000,000 will be ultimately appropriated to be used in certain quantities until the completion of the canal, $10,000,000 being immediately available for the work. The only objections which have been raised are that the United States in paying for this canal should not give away its rights for its control in time of war, and that it should also hold to its former intention of fortifying both ends of the canal to prevent any damage in time of war. It is also contended, on the contrary, that the canal would be safer as neutral water, for in case of war it would be easy to destroy large parts of it from the interior, and so ruin a great work. An early debate bearing upon the whole subject, and especially the condition of the French Isthmian canal, upon which a United States Commission is still to report, is likely at an early date.
